PREFACE

THE litigation which has occurred, and the innovations introduced into the law, since publication of Volume 35 almost two decades ago, have required a re-examination of the subjects contained therein.

Every title included in this volume has been completely re-examined and revised to date to reflect the new developments since the publication of the original volume.

Also the many Definitions within the scope of this volume have been brought to date and implemented with modern concepts.

An exhaustive Descriptive-Word Index has been prepared, thumb-indexed for convenience, leads the user directly to the precise point desired. The volume will be kept currently to date by means of annual Cumulative Pocket Parts.

CORPUS JURIS

SECUNDUM

EXEMPTION. In its broad general sense, a favor, grace, or immunity;³³ an immunity or privilege, freedom from a charge or burden to which others are subject;³⁴ the personal privilege of the person exempted, with which no one else has any concern.³⁵

The word conveys the idea of being taken out from under the general rule; not to be like others who are not exempt; to receive, and not make a return;³⁶ it implies a release from some burden, duty, or obligation, or service;³⁷ and competency for, as well as capability or liability to perform, such duty or service.³⁸

It has been held equivalent to "immunity."³⁹

It has been compared with, or distinguished from, "deduction" see the C.J.S. definition of that term, "disqualification,"⁴⁰ and "limitation."⁴¹

Specifically as the freedom of the property of debtors from seizure under legal process see Exemptions § 1 and Homesteads § 1; and as to exemptions from jury service see Juries § 153; and from taxes see Taxation § 215 et seq.

Phrases employing the word are set out in the note.⁴²

33. U.S.—Bartholomew v. City of Austin, Tex., 85 F. 359, 368, 29 C.C. A. 568.

Me.—Maine Water Co. v. City of Waterville, 45 A. 830, 833, 93 Me. 586, 49 L.R.A. 294.

I. NATURE AND EXTENT IN GENERAL

§ 1. Definition, Origin, Nature, and Purpose

It is frequently provided by law that certain property of debtors shall not be liable to seizure and sale under legal process for the payment of their debts, the freedom so conferred being termed an exemption. The right to an exemption rests entirely on constitutional or statutory provisions.

In its broad, general sense "exemption" is defined as "immunity,"¹ a "privilege,"² "freedom from any service, charge, burden, taxes, etc., to which others are subject."³

As employed in this title, the term "exemption" may be defined as the freedom of property of debtors from liability to seizure and sale under legal process for the payment of their debts.⁴ The free-

Other definitions

(1) A right given by law to a debtor to retain a portion of his property free from the claims of creditors. Tenn.—Poore v. Bowlin, 265 S.W. 671, 150 Tenn. 412.

Tex.—Pickens v. Pickens, 83 S.W.2d 951, 125 Tex. 410.

(2) A privilege or immunity allowed by law to a judgment debtor by which he may hold property to a certain amount or certain classes of property, free from all liability to dom of real property of the debtor from such liability, ordinarily termed a "homestead" exemption, is treated in the title Homesteads. While homestead and personal property exemptions are of the same general nature,⁵ a homestead and an exemption are distinguishable in that the former consists of the home or family residence and is necessarily realty, while the latter, although commonly confined to personal property, may refer to realty or personalty, or both, without regard to home or residence.⁶ The exemption is regarded as personal in character and not as an incident of property.⁷

Exemptions of the character herein considered rest entirely on constitutional or statutory provisions,⁸ and such exemptions from liability to seizure levy and sell, on execution, attachment, or other process issued in pursuance of, and for the satisfaction of, a money judgment.

Exemption as estate or chattel interest

(1) An exemption of personal property is not in the nature of an estate in the property analogous to a homestead right in land.

Tex.—Lyon & Matthews Co. v. Modern Order of Prætorians, Civ.App., 142 S.W. 29.

(2) The debtor's interest, if it can be called an interest at all and if it is anything beyond a mere negative immunity from disturbance under a particular writ, is in the nature of a chattel interest.

Mo.—State v. Harrington, 33 Mo.App. 476.

Inchoate encumbrance

However, in a state wherein the exemption is of property of a specified aggregate value, whether the property is realty or personalty or both, the right of exemption is deemed to affect the debtor's whole property as an inchoate encumbrance created by law.

of the family being the main consideration.¹⁷ Exemption statutes do not protect the rights of creditors,^{17.5} and they are not for the purpose of enabling some creditor to secure for himself a percentage of the debtor's estate larger than that secured by other general creditors.^{17.10}

Permanency of exemption. It has been stated that an essential feature of an exemption is that the property shall be permanently exempt in the debtor's hands from seizure by his creditors under judicial process.¹⁸ When this feature is present, or at least where the property was exempt when debts were incurred, the exempt property is something on which creditors cannot be regarded as having extended credit, and from which they cannot have anticipated satisfaction,¹⁹ and, therefore, they are not injured or deprived of any rights by the exemption.²⁰

§ 2. What Law Governs

As a general rule, all questions of exemption are to be determined by the laws of the forum, although in some instances the exemption laws of the place of the debtor's residence are afforded recognition in other states as a matter of comity.

Since exemption laws are usually regarded as pertaining to the remedy only²¹ and as having no extraterritorial effect,²² they will not be enforced by the courts of another state.²³ They create a personal privilege rather than a right²⁴ and do not enter into the contract in such a way that they may be set up in any jurisdiction in which it may be sought to subject the property of the debtor to the satisfaction of the debt.²⁵

Generally speaking, therefore, all questions of exemption are to be determined solely by the laws of the forum.²⁶ This rule applies when a debtor endeavors to claim the benefit of the exemption laws of a jurisdiction other than that of the forum,²⁷ and, if there is no right of exemption under the statutes of the state in which the proceedings are brought, the debtor cannot set up the exemption laws of another state of which he is a resident, unless there is something in the rule of comity between the states to require recognition of such laws.²⁸ or where the creditor and debtor are both nonresidents but are residents of different states.³¹ It is obvious that, where the exemption laws in the foreign and domestic jurisdictions are the same, no occasion arises for the application of the doctrine of comity;³² but the doctrine has been applied where the laws of the two states are similar or practically the same and manifest the same policy.³³

Evasion of law of debtor's residence. Even though suit is brought within the state by a non-resident creditor for the purpose of evading an exemption right conferred by the state of the debtor's residence, it has been held that the courts will not enforce an exemption conferred by the law of another state,³⁴ although, where the statutes of the forum do not limit the benefit of the exemption laws to residents, they will allow the exemption conferred by the local statute;³⁵ but on principles of comity it has been held in some jurisdictions that, where the debtor and creditor are non-residents and the suit is brought for the purpose of evading the exemption laws of the place of the debtor's residence, the court will recognize and enforce such laws,³⁶ as where it is sought to reach the wages earned by the debtor in the state of his residence and exempt by the law of such state.³⁷

A similar conclusion has been reached on the reasoning that, where a creditor, a debtor, and a garnishee at the time of the creation of both debts are residents of another state wherein the debts are intended to be payable, the exemption of wages is such an incident and condition of the debt of the employer that it will follow the debt if the debt follows the person of the garnishee into another state and attach itself to every process of collection in that state unless jurisdiction is obtained over the person of the principal debtor.³⁸ Conversely, it has been held that, where the debt for wages was exempt from execution by the law of the forum, the employer could not as against the employee set off a payment made by it as garnishee in a foreign state, the employee never having gone into such state.³⁹

By statute in some jurisdictions provision is made, at least in certain classes of cases, for allowing a nonresident debtor the same exemption as is afforded to him by the law of the state in which he resides,⁴⁰ as in case of proceedings within the state to reach wages earned and payable to the debtor outside of the state.⁴¹ Other statutes make it unlawful to assign or transfer a debt for the purpose of having it collected outside of the state for the purpose of evading the law of the state as to exemptions.⁴²

Proceeds of insurance. It has been held that, where the contract between insurer and insured is made in a state wherein insurer is incorporated and domiciled, its funds are kept, and its certificate is payable, an exemption of money payable thereunder from seizure for the debts of a certificate holder or of any beneficiary named in the certificate afforded by the law of insurer's domicile may be availed of by a beneficiary in a foreign jurisdiction.⁴³

Child support; alimony

Where Nebraska law allowed same exemption as Missouri law, wage earner was entitled to that exemption. However, policy of the Nebraska law that exemption statutes will not be construed to permit a father to shield himself against the claims of his child would not be enforced because contrary to the policy of Missouri. Likewise, judgment debtor was not entitled under rule of comity to any exemption under Nebraska statute with respect to provisions of judgment relating to alimony, in view of the public policy of Missouri to allow no exemptions of wages in proceedings in garnishment in aid of execution of decrees for alimony.

§ 3. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

Subject to constitutional limitations, directions, or requirements, the legislature may enact, amend, or repeal exemption laws.

While effect is accorded constitutional provisions expressly fixing the amount, or the amount and character, of personal property exemptions,⁴⁴ or directing the legislature to enact laws granting exemptions,⁴⁵ nevertheless, subject to constitutional limitations, restrictions, directions, or requirements,⁴⁶ it is within the power of the legislature to enact,⁴⁷ amend,⁴⁸ or repeal⁴⁹ exemption laws.

The point was mentioned in a case wherein the decision, however, was placed on the ground that the fund in question was not liable to attachment under the laws of the forum.

Abrogation of all exemptions

The legislature cannot, in violation of constitutional provisions relating to exemption, practically destroy all exemption rights or abrogate all exemption laws without the contemporaneous passage of substitutes therefor.

Endowment policy proceeds

An unreasonable exemption of property from seizure and sale for payment of debt in violation of the constitution does not arise with respect to endowment policy proceeds, which are not due and payable to insured and which have not vested in him and which, in absence of exercise of his strictly personal right of option, will not become due during the policy's prematurity period.

The legislature has the power to provide that funds in the hands of governmental agencies shall not be subject to attachment or legal process of any kind.

Pa.—Commonwealth v. Mooney, 92 A.2d 258, 172 Pa.Super. 30.

Legislative policy

(1) Where the constitution does not direct the legislature to set aside any particular property, the amount and kind of property to be exempt from execution is purely a question of legislative policy.

(2) As stated in Constitutional Law § 154, the courts will not interfere with such policy.

Method of selecting property

Under constitutional provision allowing head of family to select personalty exempt from sale on execution for debt based on contract, general assembly has power to prescribe method of selecting property claimed to be exempt from execution.

Congress or the state legislature may immunize a fund from every attachment including process on behalf of a wife for the collection of a support order.

Provision held not unconstitutional

Provision of statute, exempting from garnishment twenty dollars out of weekly wages due to head of a family, that no money due or earned as wages shall be exempt from garnishment in lieu of any other property, is not unconstitutional as violative of provision requiring legislature to protect from forced sale certain portion of property of heads of families, since head of family still has twenty dollars per week exemption out of wages and can still claim a lieu exemption out of any property other than wages if he does not possess certain domestic animals.

Statute distinct from constitutional provision

The law making linens and clothing belonging to the debtor and his wife and tools and instruments necessary for exercise of his or her calling, trade, or profession in which he or she makes a living, exempt from seizure, is entirely distinct from homestead exemption provisions of constitution.

Tenn.—Frazier v. Nashville Veterinary Hospital, 201 S.W. 751, 139 Tenn. 440.

25 C.J. p 10 note 49.

(2) Where an act provides that a prior statute "should be amended so as to read as follows," the amendatory act is a substitute for the original statute and repeals all those parts of the prior act which are omitted.

Similarly, in a field wherein congress may legislate, it may enact exemption laws.⁵⁰

While it has been held that a more extended exemption given in a statute than in the constitution is unconstitutional and void,⁵¹ it is, of course, held otherwise where the constitutional provision is not regarded as exhaustive or exclusive or as a limitation on the legislative power over the species of property in question.⁵² At any rate, a statute cannot restrict an exemption allowed by the constitution,⁵³ nor can the legislature grant an exemption as against a debt which the constitution expressly excepts.⁵⁴

Consideration is given in other titles to the validity of exemption laws as against objections that they constitute class legislation, see Constitutional Law, § 500 b, grant special privileges or immunities, Constitutional Law § 465 a, impair vested rights, Constitutional Law § 236, impair the obligation of contracts, Constitutional Law § 390 a, deny due process of law, Constitutional Law § 625 c, and violate constitutional provisions as to the subjects and titles of acts generally, Statutes § 235, and amendatory acts, Statutes § 254. Whether constitutional provisions relating to exemptions are self-executing is discussed in Constitutional Law

§ 51. The constitutionality of statutes exempting the proceeds of life insurance policies is considered infra §§ 39, 40, the constitutionality of statutory exceptions to general exemption laws infra § 71, and the operation and effect of a constitutional provision allowing a debtor to waive his exemptions infra § 102.

§ 4. — Construction of Statutes

- a. In general
- b. Strict or liberal construction

a. In General

Exemption laws are to be construed in accordance with general principles of statutory construction, with a view to carrying out the lawmakers' intention.

One of the cardinal rules of construction of exemption laws is that the intention of the lawmakers must be ascertained and carried out.⁵⁵ The usual principles of statutory construction which are applied in construing exemption laws include the principles that the intention of the lawmaker must prevail over the literal sense of the terms, and the spirit and intention of the statute must prevail over its strict letter;⁵⁶ that where a statute is ambiguous the court will, in construing it, have regard to its object and spirit and follow that construction

Minn.—Shadewald v. Phillips, 75 N. W. 717, 72 Minn. 520.
25 C.J. p 10 note 48.

Repeals by implication are not favored, an intent to repeal not being imputed to the legislature in the absence of clear and unmistakable language.

Proceeds of insurance policies

(1) Statute enacted to provide for distribution of avails of life insurance made payable to deceased, his personal representatives, his heirs or estate, and providing that avails should not be subject to debts of decedent, is not an exemption statute and does not violate constitutional provision that right of a debtor to enjoy comforts and necessities of life shall be recognized by law as exempting to all heads of families a homestead, the value of which shall be limited and defined by law, and a reasonable amount of personalty.

N.D.—Lapland v. Stearns, 54 N.W.2d 748, 79 N.D. 62.

(2) The preference or exemption given to an insured's beneficiary under statutes giving beneficiaries of a life policy a preferred right to its proceeds over the claims of the insured's creditors does not create a discriminatory classification as to creditors, with respect to proceeds in violation of the constitution dealing with exemption of property from seizure and sale for payment of debt.

which carries out the purpose for which it was passed;⁵⁷ that all parts of the statute must be construed together;⁵⁸ that all statutes in pari materia must be construed together and the intent of the lawmakers must be determined from a consideration of the whole;⁵⁹ that a statute must be construed so that, if it can be prevented, no clause, section, or word should be void, superfluous, or without significance;⁶⁰ that particular words may be ignored if out of harmony with the general purpose of the act, unless they are used by way of proviso or exception, or indicate a positive intent inconsistent with the general spirit;⁶¹ that words used in the statute must be given their ordinary meaning;⁶² that where special words are used, followed by words of more general import, the general words are to be limited to things of the same kind as are described by the special words, unless an intention may be found to extend their meaning;⁶³ and that the express mention of one thing implies the exclusion of another of the same class.⁶⁴

b. Strict or Liberal Construction

Exemption laws are to be construed liberally, in favor of persons within their purview, so as to effectuate their beneficent purposes.

Although it has been held that exemption laws are to be strictly construed,⁶⁵ the rule adopted by practically all of the courts is that they are to be construed liberally, in favor of persons within their purview, so as to effectuate their beneficent purposes⁶⁶ and that they are to be construed liberally

Axiomatic

It is axiomatic that exemption statutes are given a liberal construction.

U.S.—In re Bailey, D.C.Neb., 172 F. Supp. 925.

Doubts resolved in favor of exemption

Exemption statutes should receive a liberal construction and any doubts as to a claimed exemption should be resolved in favor of those claiming the benefits provided.

Consideration of spirit of statute

Liberal construction of exemption statute requires that the spirit as well as the literal wording of the statute be taken into consideration in construing it.

U.S.—Dinkins v. Cornish, D.C.Ark., 41 F.2d 766.

Most liberal construction

Exemption statutes are generally subject to most liberal construction courts can possibly give them.

in favor of such persons so as to promote justice;^{66.5} but the construction, although liberal, must be reasonable.⁶⁷ Such laws are not to be interpreted against obvious intention or manifest justice;⁶⁸ nor are they to be so interpreted as to pervert their benevolent design by enabling gross frauds to be perpetrated under color of law.⁶⁹

The rule of liberal construction must not be indulged to the extent of conferring privileges and benefits by construction which were not intended to be conferred by the legislature,⁷⁰ or to the extent of doing violence to the express terms of the statute;⁷¹ so, where a specified article or class of personal property is made exempt, the courts are not authorized to extend the exemption by construction to any other or different article or class.⁷²

only where claimant proves to be in the statutory class given exemption;⁷³ the statutes should not be extended for the benefit of those not coming within their purview,⁷⁴ and debtors claiming the benefit of such statutes must bring themselves at least within the spirit of their provisions.⁷⁵ Furthermore, the rule of liberal construction applies only to the grant of an exemption, provisions which limit or take away the exemption being strictly construed, whether in provisos⁷⁶ and exceptions, as discussed infra § 71, or in amending statutes.⁷⁷ Also, a strict or limited construction will be favored where such a construction will preserve the constitutionality of a statute conferring an exemption, as by avoiding a retroactive construction.⁷⁸ ply or operate retroactively unless the intention that it shall do so is clear; so it will not otherwise apply as against debts in existence prior to the date it became effective.

An exemption law will not be construed as retroactive unless the intention that it shall so operate is clearly apparent,⁷⁹ particularly where such construction would affect the rights of preëxisting creditors or alter vested contractual rights,⁸⁰ or would invalidate the statute,⁸¹ as where it would make the statute violative of constitutional provisions forbidding laws impairing the obligation of contracts⁸² or retrospective in their operation.⁸³ Consequently the law does not apply as against debts in existence prior to the date it became effective.⁸⁴ Effect will be accorded to provisions of exemption laws that they shall apply only as against judgments or liabilities on contracts entered into after their enactment or after a specified date thereafter,⁸⁵ but a statute providing that it shall not apply to any judgment obtained prior to a specified date is construed to mean that it applies to any judgment obtained on or after the specified date, including a judgment based on a former judgment.⁸⁶ A statute exempting the proceeds of disability insurance may apply to the proceeds of policies written before its enactment.⁸⁷

Judgment on running account. Where certain items of an account accrued prior to the taking effect of an exemption statute and others subsequent thereto, and the creditor sues on the entire account and obtains judgment for the full amount, it has been held in one jurisdiction that the debtor is entitled to claim the benefit of the exemption law as against the entire judgment,⁸⁸ while in another jurisdiction it has been held that under such circumstances the debtor, in order to have the benefit of the exemption, must pay that portion of the judgment representing the part of the debt contracted before the taking effect of the exemption.⁸⁹

Antedated note. When a note is dated prior to the date when a statute of exemption takes effect, the exemption cannot be claimed as against liability to a bona fide purchaser of the note, although it may not have been put in circulation until after such date.⁹⁰

§ 6. — Effect of Change or Repeal of Exemption and Change of Form, Merger, or Renewal of Debt

A statute diminishing or taking away, but not one increasing or extending, exemptions granted by a prior law may apply retrospectively as against debts previously contracted. Whether a change in a previously contracted indebtedness, or the evidence thereof, after a change in an exemption law, renders the indebtedness subject to the law as changed depends on whether the old indebtedness is extinguished and a new obligation created or there is a mere renewal, or change in the form, of the indebtedness.

A statutory amendment which adds to, increases, or extends exemptions granted by a prior law does not apply retroactively⁹¹ as against debts existing prior to the effective date of the amendment,⁹² or at least it will not be construed so to apply where, if so applied, it would violate constitutional prohibitions of laws impairing the obligation of contracts.⁹³ In such case, the law in force at the time the debt was contracted, and not that which is in force when the exemption is claimed, will control as to the debtor's right of exemption;⁹⁴ indeed, it has been broadly stated that the exemption laws in effect at the time of the creation of the obligation, and not those in effect at the time of an execution, determine what personal property of the debtor is exempt.⁹⁵ However, it is generally held that, where the debtor's exemptions have been diminished or taken away, the law at the time the execution or garnishment is issued,⁹⁶ rather than the prior law,⁹⁷ controls, it being permissible for such new law to have a retrospective effect.⁹⁸

It would seem that where the old exemption is not recognized by the subsequent statute, but is entirely repealed, the debtor's right of exemption is destroyed, since the law conferring an exemption must be in force when the exemption is claimed,⁹⁹ and a law which has been repealed cannot be revived by a claim made under it, although it may have been in force when the contract was made.¹ It should be noted, however, that, while the debtor does not have a vested right in the exemption, he may under the operation of an exemption law acquire a vested right,² as where his property has been sold and a portion of the proceeds set apart to him as exempt.³ Where the exemption law as changed does not withdraw from liability more property in value than was exempt at the time the contract was made, the debtor may have the advantage of the law as changed.⁴

Effect will, of course, be given to provisions in new exemption laws which expressly save the exemptions in force prior to their enactment with regard to contracts made before such time.⁵

The effect of the unconstitutionality of an act purporting to amend an exemption law is considered in Statutes § 270.

Change in indebtedness or evidence thereof generally. After a change in an exemption law, a debt is not rendered subject to the law as changed by a mere change in the form of the debt,⁶ or a renewal thereof,⁷ or a merger in a new security without intention to satisfy the original debt.⁸ So, where a note is made up of several items of indebtedness against part only of which an exemption may be claimed, the debtor cannot claim his exemption as against the entire amount of the note;⁹ but where a note is given in payment of a simple contract debt the note will be subject to the exemption right existing at the time of its execution,¹⁰ and a similar rule applies where new notes are executed in payment of existing notes and not simply in renewal thereof,¹¹ or where an original indebtedness is extinguished and merged in an instrument under seal.¹²

New promise to pay barred debt. In those jurisdictions in which the view is adopted that, where a barred debt has been revived by a new promise, action should be brought on the new promise and not on the original demand, as discussed in Limitations of Actions § 320, the exemption law applicable to an action on such new promise is that existing at the time the promise was made.¹³

New promise after discharge in bankruptcy. It has been held that the date of a promise to pay a debt discharged by bankruptcy is not the date when the promise to pay is entered into, since the promise does not create a new contract, but merely revives the old debt, which is then governed by the exemption law in force at the time it is made, as against an amending law increasing the exemption;¹⁴ but under other authority the original debt is revived only as of the date of the new note, and the exemption law then in force governs as against a judgment on the note.¹⁵

Wife's antenuptial debt. Where a judgment is recovered against husband and wife on a debt owed by the wife at the time of her marriage, the husband's exemption rights are to be determined by the law in force at the time of his marriage and not by that in force at the time the debt was contracted.¹⁶ The wife's exemptions as to her separate property, however, are governed by the law in force at the time she contracted the debt.¹⁷

§ 7. Exemptions in Lieu of Homestead

The right to exemptions of personalty given, under some statutes, in lieu of a homestead or to those who have no property subject to exemption as a homestead depends on the terms and construction of the pertinent statute and its applicability to the facts of the particular case.

Under some statutes exemptions of personal property are given in lieu of a homestead or to those who have no property subject to exemption as a homestead; and such statutes will be accorded effect where they are applicable,¹⁸ but not otherwise; so, such exemptions cannot be claimed by one who owns a homestead, or who owns property subject to homestead exemption.¹⁹

Under some statutes the exemption given in lieu of a homestead is absolute, and, whether it is taken in personal or real property, the debtor acquires in and to the property so exempt an absolute ownership with full power of disposition,^{19.5} although he holds it subject to such liabilities as are enforceable against the exemption right.²⁰

Ownership, estate, or interest generally. The ownership, estate, or interest which is essential and sufficient to support a homestead exemption is considered at length in Homesteads §§ 78-92. In accordance with the rules there stated, a debtor may have a sufficient interest in property occupied by him as a homestead to prevent his claiming an exemption of personalty in lieu of a homestead where he has a life estate in the land,²¹ or the interest possessed by the equitable mortgagor of a life estate,²² or the interest of a tenant in common;²³ but a tenancy for a single year of a house, stable, and parcel of land is not sufficient, especially where the tenant does not claim a homestead in the property.²⁴

The ownership of realty in which a homestead cannot be asserted will not deprive the debtor of an exemption in lieu of homestead.²⁵

Ownership by spouse. Under a statute giving the right of exemption to "husband and wife living together . . . and not the owner of a homestead," when real estate occupied as a family homestead is owned either by the husband or the wife, neither can claim the personal property exemption,²⁶ but the ownership by the wife of property not occupied as a family homestead will not prevent the husband from claiming his exemption in personalty.²⁷ Where the statute simply provides that an exemption shall not apply to any person "who shall have a homestead exempt under the general laws of the state," the husband is not precluded from claiming an exemption by the fact that the wife owns the dwelling occupied as a family homestead;²⁸ but a contrary conclusion has been reached under a statute providing that all "heads of families who have neither lands, town lots or houses subject to such exemption as a homestead" may have an exemption in personalty.²⁹

A claim of a widow for exemptions in lieu of a homestead may be asserted only as to claims against her individually³⁰ and is limited to property which is owned by her in her individual right, as distinguished from property which was owned by her husband during his lifetime.³¹ A statute providing that, where no homestead has been claimed in the manner provided by law, either prior or subsequent to the death of the person whose estate is being administered, the court shall award and set off to the surviving spouse property of the estate not exceeding a certain value and the award shall be in lieu of all homestead provisions and of exemptions, while having the effect of freeing the property awarded from the burden of provable debts of the estate, is not strictly an exemption statute, but is more in the nature of a distribution or preferred creditor statute;³² and the question whether property so awarded, and which manifestly becomes the separate property of the surviving spouse, is exempt from execution in satisfaction of his or her separate debts is to be determined, not under such statute, but under the general homestead and exemption statutes.³³

Mortgage or sale of homestead. The fact that the homestead is encumbered does not give the debtor any right to claim the exemption in personalty,³⁴ although the encumbrance is for its full value,³⁵ or even for more than its full value,³⁶ or although foreclosure proceedings have been begun;³⁷ but after a sale on foreclosure the personal property exemptions may be claimed in lieu of homestead,³⁸ even before confirmation of the foreclosure sale.³⁹ The right to demand an allowance in lieu of a homestead out of the proceeds of a sale is to be determined by the state of facts at the time the surplus arising from the sale is finally disposed of by the court,^{39.5} and an inchoate right to an allowance in lieu of homestead does not constitute exempt property.^{39.10}

If the debtor sold his homestead in good faith before the levy and several days after the levy the contract was fully executed, he was not at the time of the levy the "owner of a homestead," so as to be precluded from his exemption in personalty,⁴⁰

but, if the debtor owns a homestead or land subject to exemption as a homestead at the time of the levy on personal property or the service of a garnishee summons, he cannot by afterward transferring the homestead render the personal property exempt.⁴¹

Allowance from wages or money due. Under statute so permitting, exemptions in lieu of homestead may properly be claimed out of current wages which have been garnished;⁴² and, while a statute expressly precluding allowance of the exemption from money, salary, or wages due the debtor from any person, partnership, or corporation will, when applicable, be accorded effect,⁴³ such a statute has been held not to apply to government bonds⁴⁴ or to money arising from the sale of real estate under an order of court to satisfy a judgment lien.⁴⁵

§ 8. Effect of Ownership or Possession of Other Property

With some qualifications and exceptions in particular jurisdictions, the general rule is that the fact that other property, which is not exempt, is owned or possessed by the debtor or members of his family does not defeat his right to the benefit of a statutory exemption of the property in question. A debtor having the right to select the property which he will hold as exempt cannot be compelled to select encumbered, rather than unencumbered, property.

The debtor's right to claim an exemption given him by statute to personal property of a specified value⁴⁶ or specific articles of personalty⁴⁷ is not affected by the fact that he owns other property. In at least one jurisdiction the debtor is not required to turn out other property possessed by him

Application of specific statute

Delinquent taxes on homestead properties constitute a "lien" precluding the allowance of a homestead within meaning of statute providing that, where homestead is charged with liens, some of which preclude the allowance of a homestead, but others of which do not, and sale of such homestead is had, then, after payment, out of proceeds of sale, of liens precluding the allowance of a homestead, balance, not exceeding five hundred dollars, shall be awarded to the head of the family or the wife in lieu of such homestead; and this statute being a specific one intended to reach just such a situation as is presented in the case, a homestead cannot be set up in defiance of it.

for levy as a condition to a claim of his exemption,⁴⁸ but in other jurisdictions the debtor, in claiming a right of selection, must offer to surrender to the officer other property in his hands subject to execution,⁴⁹ or other property of the particular kind taken,⁵⁰ at least where the article levied on is not specifically exempt⁵¹ or, if specifically exempt, is levied on without his knowledge.⁵² A debtor who has no more property than the law allows him to claim as exempt is of course not bound to surrender any part of such property to be levied on, as a condition on which he may claim the rest.⁵³

The selection by the debtor of property claimed by him as exempt where he owns property or articles in excess of the value or number exempted by law is considered infra § 138, and his claim or selection, under permissive statutory provisions, of other property in lieu of articles specifically exempted infra § 56. The effect of ownership, or lack of ownership, of a homestead on the right to an exemption in lieu of a homestead is treated supra § 7.

Income other than earnings for personal services. An exemption, granted by statute, of a specified portion of the earnings of the judgment debtor received for his personal services at any time within a stated period next preceding the levy is not to be denied because other income, regardless of its amount, may have been received by, or become due to, him during the statutory period.⁵⁴

Ownership by members of family. Where the statute gives the exemption right to the head of the family, his right is not affected by the ownership of other property by the other members of the family;⁵⁵ but the rule is otherwise where the statute exempts property for the use of the family.⁵⁶

Mere possession of other property will not affect the debtor's right to exemption of property owned by him,⁵⁷ unless the statute expressly puts property in his possession on the same footing as property which he owns;⁵⁸ and under such a statute, property in the debtor's possession may be regarded as his property, even though the title to it is in doubt, where it appears that the question of ownership has been made doubtful by the debtor himself.⁵⁹

Deductions. Money paid out by the debtor between the time of filing his claim of exemptions and the filing of his inventory will be deducted from the amount of his exemption,⁶⁰ unless the payment was of just debts.⁶¹ Where property of nominally greater value than the claim against him was conveyed by a debtor to his creditor in payment of the debt, with a provision that if more was realized from the sale of the property than was required for payment of the debt the surplus should be returned to the debtor, no deduction can be made from the debtor's exemption on that account, in the absence of anything to show that any sum would accrue to the debtor from this source;⁶² but, where a surplus from the sale is shown over and above the amount of the debt, the amount of the surplus will be deducted from the debtor's exemption.⁶³

Property sold or encumbered by debtor. Property which a debtor has sold, and delivered to the purchaser, on condition that it is to become his on paying for it, is not owned by the debtor to such an extent as to prevent him from claiming other property as exempt.⁶⁴ However, a debtor, after a suit has been brought against him, cannot dispose of a portion of his property and then claim that he possesses nothing but what is exempt.⁶⁵ When the debtor has a right to select the property which he will hold as exempt, he cannot be compelled to select property that is mortgaged or pledged or otherwise encumbered, instead of unencumbered property,⁶⁶ or at least he will not be compelled to accept his exemption out of the encumbered property at its full value.⁶⁷ Property on which there is no lien must be first exhausted in allotting the debtor's exemption.⁶⁸ Under the rule, stated supra this section, that the debtor must surrender other property than that which he claims as exempt, he is not excused by the fact that the other property is mortgaged if he does not inform the officer of the facts.⁶⁹

A statute exempting one half of the debtor's earnings for his personal services rendered within a specified period next preceding the levy applies to one half of the earnings levied on regardless of the disposition made of past earnings or of income from some other source.⁷⁰

Mortgage or sale of the homestead as affecting the right to claim exemption in lieu of homestead is considered supra § 7, and the effect of fraudulent conveyance of property on the right to exemption infra § 118.

Property outside of jurisdiction. It would seem that a debtor is not prevented from claiming property as exempt in one county because he may have property outside the county which is not levied on,⁷¹ although there is also authority to the contrary.⁷² Inability of the debtor to surrender other property owned by him, because it is held under execution by the sheriff of another county, excuses him,⁷³ and his failure to surrender under such circumstances will not justify the officer in levying on property selected by the debtor as exempt.⁷⁴

Liquor license. On a contest of a claim for exemptions, a license to retail liquors cannot be estimated as property for the purpose of reducing the exemptions claimed by the debtor to whom it is granted, where it is a mere personal privilege and is not transferable or a subject of sale.⁷⁵

§ 9. Intent in Acquisition of Property

Consideration is given infra § 118 to the effect, if any, of the purpose with which nonexempt property was converted into exempt property, as well as the effect, on a claim of exemption, of the acquisition in fraud of creditors of the property in which the exemption is claimed.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 10. Duration and Termination

The law is extremely reluctant to deprive a person of the benefits and advantages of an exemption. In the absence of statutory provision for its continuance thereafter, an exemption terminates on the death of the person in whose favor it was created.

The law is extremely solicitous of the rights of those to whom it accords exemption, and it is extremely reluctant, after conferring its beneficence on a person, to deprive him of the benefits and advantages he has earned.^{75.50} Under a statute so providing, a debtor who "is about to leave the state" may be entitled to no exemptions, and the statute applies to a debtor who has left the state before the execution is issued.^{75.55}

An exemption does not continue after the death of the person in whose favor it was created, in the absence of a statute providing for such continuance.⁷⁶ At least as to certain classes of exempt property, a judgment obtained during the lifetime of the debtor does not create any lien, dormant or otherwise;⁷⁷ and, in such case, on the death of the debtor, judgment creditors stand on the same footing as ordinary creditors and have no priority over such creditors or among themselves.⁷⁸

II. PERSONS ENTITLED TO PRIVILEGE

§ 11. In General

Only those persons who come within the terms of the statutes creating exemptions may claim them.

Exemptions of the character under consideration, being purely statutory in their origin, as discussed supra § 1, may be claimed only by those persons who come within the terms of the statutes creating them.⁷⁹

§ 12. Residence and Citizenship

- a. In general
- b. Sufficiency of residence
- c. Residence of wife
- d. Residence of family

a. In General

Where the statute expressly requires residence, non-residents may not claim exemptions thereunder, but in the absence of express provision the courts disagree as to whether the exemption statute is for the benefit of residents only. Unless otherwise specified by the statute, resident aliens are within its terms.

In the absence of an express provision in an exemption statute restricting its operation to residents of the state, it has been held by some courts that persons only temporarily within the state, if otherwise coming within the terms of the statute, are entitled to its benefits.⁸⁰ A contrary view is taken by other courts, however, and the operation of the statute is restricted to residents of the state.⁸¹

a construction which may be aided by the fact that another statute provides that no exemption shall be allowed the execution debtor in case of an execution issued against one who is about to leave the state.⁸² In these states a nonresident debtor cannot claim the exemption privilege simply because, in the suit brought against him, garnishment proceedings are instituted against a resident.⁸³

Express restriction to residents. When the statute in express terms requires residence, as is often the case, it is clear that nonresidents cannot claim the benefit thereof,⁸⁴ and this rule applies also to nonresidents who are temporarily in the state.⁸⁵ A statute denying to nonresident debtors the benefit of exemption laws does not remove them from the operation of a statute which is not one of exemption but which amounts to a limitation of jurisdiction and withdraws certain property from the operation of a particular process.⁸⁶ A statute giving exemptions to residents of cities, towns, and villages is applicable to urban districts although not incorporated, where such districts are in fact settled and inhabited as cities and towns.⁸⁷

Time of becoming resident. When a statute requires a debtor to be a resident of the state to entitle him to the benefit of the exemption laws, it is not necessary that he shall have been a resident at the time when the debt was contracted, but it is sufficient if he is a resident at the time of the levy as against which the exemption is claimed.⁸⁸

(1) The court, in construing Act No. 20 of 1914, § 21, par. 1, as amended by Act No. 85 of 1926, held that unless the exemption statute is expressly confined to residents, it also applies to nonresidents of the state.

Citizenship. Under statutes so providing, only citizens are entitled to claim exemptions,⁸⁹ although under such statutes the fact of citizenship is presumed from residence.⁹⁰ Unless there is something, however, to show an intention to the contrary, the term "citizen" in a statute giving an exemption to citizens of the state should be construed as equivalent to "resident," and to include unnaturalized residents; and citizenship is not necessary to constitute one a resident within the meaning of the exemption laws.⁹¹

b. Sufficiency of Residence

A person who moves into the state with the intention of making it his home is a resident of the state, within the exemption laws, regardless of the length of time of his residence and even before he obtains a place of permanent residence.

A person who moves into the state with his family and personal property for the purpose of residing therein is a resident of the state, within the exemption laws, before he has secured a place of permanent residence,⁹² even though he moves into the state with the purpose of residing there for only a limited time, and with the purpose of later moving elsewhere.⁹³ He becomes a resident as soon as he has come into the state with the intention of making it his home, and it is not necessary that he should be a resident for any particular length of time.⁹⁴

Residence on an Indian reservation within the state is residence in the state, within the meaning of a residence requirement in the exemption law, and the claimant's right to exemption is not impaired by the fact that technically he is a trespasser on the reservation, although no complaint to his living there had ever been made by the Indians or by the government.⁹⁵

The domicile of a wife, for the purpose of determining her right to the benefit of exemption laws requiring residence, is generally that of her husband even though she is actually in another state, unless she is out of the state under circumstances amounting to a wrongful abandonment.

The domicile of a wife, for the purpose of determining her right to the benefit of the exemption laws requiring residence, as for most other purposes, is generally that of her husband, so that she may claim an exemption when her husband is a resident, although she is actually in another state.⁹⁶ Under these circumstances she is not entitled to the benefit of the exemption laws of the state where she actually resides,⁹⁷ even though her husband in the other state has become insane.⁹⁸ The mere fact that the wife has never been in her husband's state, there having been no abandonment, does not prevent her domicile from being that of her husband.⁹⁹ Where, however, in such case, she retains her actual residence in her own state, she is entitled to the benefit of its exemption laws.¹

When a wife voluntarily absents herself under circumstances amounting to a wrongful abandonment of her husband, and permanently resides in another state, it has been held that she loses her residence, and cannot claim the benefit of a statute which expressly or impliedly requires residence.²

Under a statute so providing, the family for whose benefit the exemption is intended must reside within the state, although the debtor need not reside there; in the absence of an express requirement of residence of the family within the state, the authorities are divided as to the necessity therefor.

Some statutes of exemption expressly require that the family for whose benefit they are intended shall reside in the state, and when a statute creates a right of exemption for the benefit of every family in the state it does not extend to one who has no family, or whose family resides in another state.³ Under such a statute, however, the debtor need not necessarily reside in the state but it is sufficient if his family resides there.⁴

In the absence of such a requirement it has been held that if the debtor resides in the state, and supports a family, it is immaterial where his family resides,⁵ but he nevertheless must be a part of the family.⁶ According to other authority, the family must be resident within the state in order to warrant a claim of exemption.⁷ Under a statute which exempts the earnings of all persons who have to provide for the entire support of a family within the state, a person who does not reside in the state, and whose family does not reside therein, is not entitled to the exemption.⁸

§ 13. — Change of Residence and Absence from State

- a. In general
- b. Intention or preparations to remove
- c. Temporary absence and intention to return

a. In General

Where residence is necessary, a debtor loses the benefit of the exemption statutes by absconding or removing from the state. The courts disagree as to the application of this rule where the debtor was a resident at the time his property was levied.

When residence is necessary, a person clearly loses his right to claim property as exempt by absconding or removing from the state so as to lose his residence therein.⁹ In some jurisdictions this rule applies although the debtor is a resident at the time of levying on the property.¹⁰ In other jurisdictions it has been held that the debtor's status as a resident is fixed at the time the execution is levied and a claim for exemption is made and will not be defeated by a subsequent removal of the debtor.¹¹

who changes his domicile to another state can be held exempt by him.¹² A fugitive from justice who cannot be found within the state is a nonresident within the meaning of the exemption laws in the absence of evidence showing his intention to return,¹³ but where it is shown that he is merely keeping himself hidden to avoid a criminal prosecution, and that he is occasionally seen in the county, he does not lose his residence or cease to be a householder in such a sense as to deprive him of his exemption.¹⁴ Moving from place to place within the state does not affect the debtor's claim to exemption.¹⁵

Although one's intention and acts as to removal from the state may have made him legally a nonresident, yet if, before sale of his property under levy and at the time he claims its exemption therefrom, he has, by change of intention and circumstances, in good faith, again become a resident of the state, he is entitled to the benefit of the exemption law.¹⁶

Unless a statute provides otherwise, a mere intention of the debtor to remove from the state, although avowed and followed by preparations to remove, ordinarily does not affect his right of exemption as a resident of the state.

Mere intention to remove from the state, although avowed, and although followed by preparations to move, does not affect a debtor's right to claim exemptions as a resident of the state,¹⁷ even though the preparations have reached the point where his family has already left the state for the new home,¹⁸ or where he has preceded them and they are at the railroad station on the way with their household goods,¹⁹ or where the household goods have been shipped ahead of the debtor and his family.²⁰ Until he and his family have passed the boundary into the foreign state, he is a resident of the state he is leaving, and entitled to the benefit of its exemption laws, and his status is not affected by the purpose of his journey.²¹

Some statutory provisions, however, take away the exemption of a debtor starting to leave the state or about to take up his abode in another state,²² or who is in the act of removing with his family from the state,²³ and there is authority, in the absence of statute, that where a resident, with fixed intention to remove to another state and there reside, sets out for that state in pursuance of his intention he becomes a nonresident within the meaning of the exemption law as soon as he begins his removal.²⁴

A mere temporary absence of a debtor from the state, however protracted, generally does not defeat his right to the benefit of the exemption laws if he continues to maintain his residence within the jurisdiction and intends to return.

As a general rule, a mere temporary absence of a debtor from the state, however protracted, does not defeat his right to the benefit of the exemption laws,²⁵ even though it may be accompanied by an intention to change his residence at some future time to the foreign state where he is, for the time, sojourning.²⁶ As long as the debtor maintains his residence within the jurisdiction, together with an animus revertendi, he is entitled to his exemption.²⁷ His residence continues until he leaves it with an intention not to return,²⁸ as manifested by his acts and the surrounding circumstances²⁹ or by his direct testimony to that fact.³⁰

It has been said that under the exemption laws a debtor must be conclusively presumed to reside where his family live with his consent, where there has been no separation between husband and wife, and where they occupy the old home, even though he is voluntarily absent, and he cannot by such voluntary absence deprive his family of their rights in the household property.³¹

While undoubtedly a long absence will not, per se, deprive a debtor of his right of exemption, it may raise a presumption of fact that a change in domicile is intended,³² which a mere floating purpose to return to the state at some indefinite time will not rebut.³³

In this group of cases, of prolonged absence and an indefinite purpose to return, there are some courts with a tendency to restrict the operation of the rule generally followed, which hold that there is a distinction between domicile or legal residence and residence in fact, and that a man who has left the state with his family and settled in another state may cease to be a resident of the state which he has left, within the meaning of the exemption laws, although there may be such an intention to return as will continue legal residence or domicile.³⁴

Temporary absence of a debtor and his family, even though it may not change his residence in law, may deprive him of the character of a "resident householder," and so defeat his claim of exemption, for under such a statute he must keep house in the state.³⁵ to claim an exemption is affected by the nature and character of the property claimed as exempt, and these matters are considered infra §§ 26-62.

§ 15. — "Debtor," "Defendant," and "Tenant"

Under statutes giving the privilege of exemption to "debtors" and "defendants," only those occupying such position may claim the privilege. Unless further qualified by statute a claimant need not be head of a family. "Tenants" who are debtors may also be entitled to exemption privileges under some statutes.

If the statute in terms gives the privilege of exemption to "debtors" and "defendants" only, no person can claim property as exempt unless he occupies this position.³⁷ Where the statute gives the exemption privilege to debtors, without further qualifying their status, it is not necessary that claimant should also be head of the family, to entitle him to the privilege under this statute.³⁸ Further, a statute exempting household articles of any debtor, necessary for himself, his wife and children does not require that he should have a wife or children, or that he must be the head of a family.³⁹ A person engaged in a particular occupation, while he may not be included as such within the terms of a statute granting the exemption privilege to persons within a restricted class of occupations, may be entitled to an exemption as a "debtor" under a statute granting the exemption to debtors, regardless of the occupation in which he is engaged.⁴⁰

Although it has been held that the exemption is personal to the debtor and does not apply to members of the debtor's family,^{40.5} there is also authority to the effect that, where the exemption is in favor of the debtor, either the husband or the wife may under some circumstances claim the exemption.⁴¹ A married woman who is a partner with her husband in a mercantile business and therefore jointly and severally liable with him is entitled

Tenant. Under some statutes "tenants" are also included, in order to give this class of debtors an exemption in goods in their possession as well as to other debtors in goods they own.⁴³ However, under such provisions, tenants must be debtors,⁴⁴ and the tenant's wife, although in a sense herself a tenant, not being also a debtor, cannot claim exemption.⁴⁵ A subtenant or assignee of the tenant, not recognized by the landlord, cannot claim the benefit of the statute as a debtor against a distress for rent where the goods are levied on as belonging to the original lessee, for the relation of landlord and tenant and, consequently, that of a debtor and creditor does not exist between him and the landlord, although a tenant may make the claim to protect a subtenant or a stranger.⁴⁶

Under some statutes a debtor with a family may claim an exemption given "for the use of a family," or to "a member of a family." A "family" is any collective body of persons who live together in one home, apart from a contract relationship, under conditions of a permanent and domestic character, and, according to some authority, under one head; but it is not essential that the group be dependent on the debtor for support.

Statutes giving exemptions "for the use of a family" or to "a member of a family," while they are so far general in terms as not to restrict their operation to heads of families,⁴⁷ are not intended for the benefit of every debtor, but only for the benefit of debtors who have families.⁴⁸ The word "family," as used in these statutes, has been judicially defined to be a collective body of persons, generally relatives and servants; a household living together in one house or curtilage; and does not embrace separate individuals who have no common home.⁴⁹ Other courts, emphasizing the authority of one member over the others as the distinguishing characteristic between the family and other groups of persons living together, have defined the family as "a collection of persons living together under one head."⁵⁰

An aggregation of individuals sustaining a mere contract relation toward each other, as master and servant or landlord and boarders, even though related,^{50.5} is not a family within the meaning of the exemption laws.⁵¹ The relations existing among the group must be of a permanent and domestic character; a mere abiding together temporarily as strangers or for convenience, there being no legal or moral obligation on the part of one to support the others, with no supervisory power on the part of anyone, does not make the group a family.⁵²

While the fact of support may have evidential value as to the existence of a family, as distinguished from a nonfamily, group,⁵³ it is not, under these statutes, an essential condition on which the claim for exemption must be based.⁵⁴ It has been held, however, that a mother who is not living with her son, but who is destitute and is supported by him as required by law is a member of his family within the statute exempting earnings necessary for the use of the debtor's family.⁵⁵

Number of members. To constitute a family there must be a collection of persons under one head and one person alone cannot be a family.⁵⁶ However, no specific number of persons is required but two are sufficient, as husband and wife, or parent and child.⁵⁷

Children. To constitute a family it is not necessary that there shall be children but the family may consist of husband and wife alone.⁵⁸

Father of bastard. The reputed father of a bastard whom he is under the law not bound to support but who lives with him has no family within the meaning of a statute giving exemptions to persons having families.⁵⁹

Common-law marriage. Parties to a common-law marriage may enjoy the benefits of a family exemption.^{59.5}

§ 17. — "Head of a Family"

- a. In general
- b. Support of family
- c. Living together
- d. After divorce or separation
- e. After death of husband or wife

a. In General

Some statutes limit exemptions "to the head of a family." "Family," as usually defined, consists of a collection of persons living together under one head, independent of any contract relation, under such circumstances that the head is under a legal or moral obligation to support the other members.

By express provisions of some statutes exemptions are limited to persons who are "the head of a family;"⁶⁰ other statutes contain an implied restriction.⁶¹ Where the exemption is reserved in general terms,^{61.5} as, for example, to "every citizen or head of a family,"⁶² it is not necessary that claimant of an exemption be the head of a family.

"Family," as defined by most courts in construing statutes exempting property of the head of the family, means a collection of persons living together under one head, under such circumstances or conditions that the head is under a legal or moral obligation to support the other members, and the other members are dependent on him for support.⁶³ However, some definitions subordinate the idea of dependency.⁶⁴ The husband and father is primarily the head of the family,⁶⁵ but not necessarily so, as appears infra §§ 19, 20, where the status of married women and unmarried persons is considered. However, to be entitled to an exemption as head of a family one must be the master in law of the family and as such stand in place of the father.⁶⁶

Widowed mother and sister

The word "family," in its ordinary meaning, includes a collection of persons, consisting of a single man, his widowed mother, and his sister, neither of whom had any other home, and who were supported from the earnings of such man.

The family must have actual existence as distinguished from one that exists theoretically only.⁶⁷ Under a statute defining a head of a family as one who has residing on the premises with him and under his care and maintenance his minor child, one is not the head of a family by reason of the fact that he is living with and maintaining an illegitimate child.⁶⁸

Master and servants. It is well settled that an aggregation of individuals sustaining a mere contract relation toward each other is not a family within the meaning of the exemption laws, as discussed supra § 16. For this reason a person who lives in a house with servants only is not entitled to the benefit of the exemption laws as the head of a family.⁶⁹

Persons keeping boarders. A person who keeps boarders is not for that reason the head of a family, if she has no person dependent on her for support.⁷⁰ It is otherwise, if she also has living with her a child whom she supports.⁷¹ It has also been held that, if a person has a friend and servants living with her in addition to the boarders, she is the head of a family within the meaning of the law.⁷²

Several families in same house. That several families live together in the same house, as boarders, or otherwise, and take their meals at a common table, does not prevent each from being a separate family, and the head of each the head of a family.⁷³

Dwelling and eating in different places. It is not necessary that the members of a family shall dwell and eat in the same house; they may live in one house and take their meals in another, or at a restaurant or hotel.⁷⁴

The age of the person claiming exemption is not material if it is shown that he is actually the head of a family.⁷⁵

Time of acquiring status. When a statute allows an exemption for the benefit of the head of a family, a debtor, to be entitled to an exemption, need not have been the head of a family at the time when the debt was contracted, but it is sufficient if he has such a status at the time of the levy as against which the exemption is claimed.⁷⁶

In several states it has been held that a man may claim property as exempt on the ground that he is a householder or the head of a family, although he may not have married and acquired such a status until after the issue or levy of an execution or attachment.⁷⁷ Other courts, however, have held that after a creditor has acquired a lien by the levy of an execution or attachment, he has a vested right which cannot be defeated by the subsequent marriage and change of status of the debtor.⁷⁸

Acquisition of a status as a householder or head of a family after the sale of property under an execution does not give one a right to the benefit of the exemption law so as to support an action to set aside the sale; to maintain such an action he must have been a householder or the head of a family at the time of the sale.⁷⁹

In order to constitute one "the head of a family" within the exemption laws, generally there must be at least a condition of dependence on the part of the other members on the head, and a natural or legal obligation on the part of the head to support them, but actual or entire support need not be shown; the rendering of support does not in itself establish one as head of a family.

It is very generally held that, to constitute one the head of a family within the purpose and intent of the exemption laws, there must be at least a condition of dependence on the part of the other members on the head, and a natural or legal obligation on the part of the head to support them, and that a mere aggregation of individuals is not enough.⁸² Moreover, some statutes require in express terms that the debtor must show that he has a family dependent on him.⁸³

While assistance in the support of a family does not in itself constitute the one who renders the assistance the head of the family,⁸⁴ it is not necessary that he should bear the entire support of the family in order to give him that status;⁸⁵ nor need actual support be shown,⁸⁶ if the obligation to support exists.⁸⁷

Legal or moral obligation. Under some statutes, it is held that a person to be the head of a family must be under a legal obligation to support its members; that the relation of husband and wife or that of parent and child must exist,⁸⁸ or a statutory duty to support be shown.⁸⁹

Most of the courts, however, do not recognize this doctrine, but hold that a mere moral or natural obligation to support and a condition of dependence, are sufficient.⁹⁰ Nevertheless the claim of exemption will not be allowed where the moral obligation on which the debtor's claim rests is in conflict with a legal obligation or another moral obligation of greater binding force, or where allowance of the claim would result in a perversion of the exemption statute, defeating the intention of the legislature.⁹¹

In the absence of a statutory requirement the debtor and his dependent children or relatives ordinarily need not live together in order for him to claim the statutory exemption accorded to the head of a family. Temporary separation of the family will not dissolve the family relation or break up the household.

It has been held in some jurisdictions that to constitute one the head of a family or a householder within the meaning of the exemption laws he must keep house or maintain a home, and that the mere fact that he has a child or other persons dependent on him for support, and supports them, is not enough,⁹² at least where the persons residing apart from him are relatives other than his wife and minor children, and he is under no duty to support them;⁹³ and in some jurisdictions the terms of the statute require that the debtor should reside with his family.⁹⁴

However, there are a number of cases in which a person supporting dependent children or relatives

has been regarded as within the statutes, both as a householder and as the head of a family, although he did not keep house, and although he and those who were dependent on him lived in different places;⁹⁵ and, especially, where it is shown that a legal obligation to support exists, a sufficient reason for allowing the exemption appears without requiring further proof as to the maintenance of the home.⁹⁶ The mere fact that a father and adult son who supports himself room together does not make the father the head of a family.⁹⁷

Boarding and living apart. It has been held that the fact that a family boards, instead of keeping house, does not destroy the family relation, and that it can make no difference in such a case that the members board at different houses.⁹⁸

Separation of family and absence of head. To entitle a person to an exemption as a householder or the head of a family, the family need not be kept together as a unit continuously, nor need he always remain with the family; temporary separation of the family, either by the absence of a member or by the absence of the head, however protracted, will not dissolve the family relation or break up the household.⁹⁹

d. After Divorce or Separation

According to some authorities, if a wife obtains a divorce and is awarded the custody of the children, the husband may not claim exemption as head of a family, even though he continues to support the children, but a husband who remarries becomes the head of a new family. Abandonment and nonsupport of his family may deprive a husband of his exemption, and the wife may thereby become head of the family.

The view has been taken that, if a wife obtains a divorce and is awarded the custody of the children, but the husband continues to support the children, he may still have his exemption as the head of the family.¹ According to some decisions, however, the fact that the husband has recognized and fulfilled his obligation to support the children by means of a transfer of property at the time of divorce,² or by an award of alimony contemplating future payments,³ does not make him the head of the family where the children do not live with him and have been placed in the custody and under the control of the wife.

Where the statute gives the exemption, not to the head of the family, but to the family, a divorced husband who is not awarded the custody of his children and lives after the divorce as a single man is not entitled to exemption under the statute,⁴ even though he contributes to the support of his children and of his former wife.⁵ If there are no children and the divorced husband has no other dependents, he cannot claim exemption as head of a family notwithstanding he continues to occupy his former home.⁶

A debtor who has deserted his family in a foreign country and contributes nothing to their support is not entitled to an exemption.⁷ An abandoned wife who lives with and supports her children is the head of the family.⁸ A wife, however, who, without just cause, separates herself from her husband, has no right to an exemption,⁹ and her husband's right to exemption as head of the family is not affected,¹⁰ even though he is living illicitly with another woman.¹¹ A childless man who lives apart from his wife and has not contributed to her support for a period of years is not the head of a family.¹²

fect the husband's right to exemption as head of the family.¹³

Remarriage. A divorced husband who remarries becomes the head of a new family.¹⁴

e. After Death of Husband or Wife

According to some authorities in the absence of statute a debtor's exemption right does not survive to his widow or children, but generally a widow or a widower may be the head of the family entitled to exemption as such after the death of the spouse, if the existence of the family is established.

A statute which makes no express provision for the survival of the right of exemption after the death of the debtor has been construed not to give the exemption right to the surviving widow or children.¹⁵ However, it has also been held that the exemption law is intended not only for the benefit of the debtor, but also for the benefit of his family, and that the right of exemption survives for the benefit of the widow.¹⁶

Widows. A widow who has living with her a child or children whom she supports is a householder or head of a family within the meaning of the exemption laws.¹⁷ It can make no difference that she lives in her father's house and is supported by him.¹⁸

It is generally considered that, if the widow lives alone and has no one dependent on her for support, she is not entitled as head of a family to an exemption and it can make no difference in such a case that she once had others living with her and dependent on her.¹⁹ There is, however, authority for the allowance of an exemption to the widow as head of a family where her children had all left her and were married,²⁰ and where those living with her were not her children, and were not entitled to look to her for their support.²¹

A widow and mother of children whom she supports is entitled as head of the family to an exemption as long as she remains a widow, but on her second marriage she loses her status as head of the family under the exemption law.²²

Widowers. A widower or a deserted or divorced husband may be a householder or the head of a family if he has a child or children dependent on him for support.²³ However, a widower is not a householder or the head of a family if he has no child or other person dependent on him, although he continues to live in the dwelling house and keeps house after the death of his wife,²⁴ nor does the fact that relatives come to the house to assist him in the housework make him head of a family.²⁵ A widower who lives alone and contributes only in part to the support of relatives is not the head of a family within the statute.²⁶

Under a statute allowing an exemption to a widower living with an unmarried daughter, a stepdaughter is not a daughter within the meaning of the law.²⁷

§ 18. — "Householders" and "Housekeepers"

Where the statute grants an exemption to a "householder," the term has been held to cover one who occupies a house, but under some statutes the debtor must be head of a family residing together and constituting a household. The term "housekeeper" means a housekeeper with a family.

Where the statute confers the right of exemption on a person who is a "householder," the term is given its literal and primary meaning of one who is "the occupier of a house."²⁸ The occupation of a house free from rent does not, of itself, deprive the occupant of his status as a householder within the exemption laws.^{28.5} Under some statutes the householder must be the master or head of a family who resides together and constitutes a household.²⁹ The term may include one who is unmarried³⁰ or is without dependents,³¹ although there is also authority to the contrary.³²

The head of a family occupying a house is a householder,³³ and this is true, although he occupies only a part of a building.³⁴ One is a householder on whom rests the duty of supporting the members of his family or household;³⁵ this is true, although the family is temporarily absent³⁶ or even though he has declared that he will not again live with it.³⁷

A debtor may be a householder although he is in the act of moving his family from one house to another,³⁸ and the statutes sometimes specifically so provide;³⁹ nor does he lose such character by a temporary cessation of housekeeping and the storing of his property with a view of renewing housekeeping at some future time.⁴⁰

"Householder" does not include a person who is a visitor in the house of another.⁴¹

Householder having a family. In some jurisdictions it is necessary that the debtor not only be a householder but that he be a "householder having a family."⁴² Such a householder may be characterized as the head of a family occupying a house and living together in one domestic establishment,⁴³ although the term has also been construed to cover the case of a man who is head of an actual family, dependent on him, whether or not he is housekeeping.⁴⁴

Housekeepers. In some jurisdictions the statute gives an exemption to a "housekeeper," instead of a "householder."⁴⁵ The term is held by the courts to mean a housekeeper with a family;⁴⁶ and by a strict construction of the statute it is held that to claim the benefit of the law the debtor must both be a housekeeper⁴⁷ and have a family.⁴⁸ However, no legal obligation to support is necessary; a natural and moral obligation to support the family is sufficient.⁴⁹ The debtor may be a housekeeper notwithstanding the temporary absence of his family.⁵⁰

Where a widow is a housekeeper and subsequently marries, the husband becomes a housekeeper and entitled to the benefit of the exemption law.⁵¹

Husband and wife. Where husband and wife are living together and the husband's property is not sufficient to make up the statutory amount of the exemption, the wife may claim an exemption to the extent necessary to make up with the husband's property such an amount.⁵²

ers"⁵³ or to the "heads of families."⁵⁴ Where the exemption is given to any resident who is "married or the head of a family," a married woman may claim the exemption where the property belongs to her and she is the debtor;⁵⁵ under such statutes a married woman need not be the head of a family.⁵⁶

Under statutes permitting married women to act as sole traders, they may be entitled to the exemptions afforded by statutes exempting stock in trade.⁵⁷

A married woman cannot claim an exemption in the right of her husband where he has permanently abandoned her or is estranged from her, and the exemption is allowed only to him.⁵⁸ Under a statute providing for certain exemptions for the head of a family or for a single person, a married woman who is not the head of a family cannot claim the exemption.⁵⁹

b. Wife as Head of Family

- (1) In general
- (2) Absconding debtor

(1) In General

A married woman may claim exemption as the head of a family under certain circumstances, even though her husband is living with her, and she may under some statutes claim an exemption which her husband has failed to assert; but the wife's right of exemption does not change or affect the title of the husband to the property claimed as exempt.

The husband is ordinarily the head of the family, as discussed supra § 17 a, but a married woman, although living with her husband, may be entitled to claim an exemption as the head of the family where from necessity she has been compelled to assume the burdens and responsibilities which belong to such headship,⁶⁰ and in some cases it might not be unreasonable to regard either husband or wife as the head of the family to an extent authorizing an assertion of an exemption right.⁶¹ The wife may be within the meaning of a statute giving an exemption to a person with a family.⁶²

A married woman whose husband is a nonresident of the state and who has no children cannot claim an exemption under a statute providing an exemption for the use of the debtor's family,⁶³ but, where under the same circumstances she is living with a younger sister as a family within the state, it has been held that she may claim as the head of the family.⁶⁴

The wife is not entitled to an exemption as head of a family unless she is in fact its head,⁶⁵ and the evidence must establish this status as a fact.⁶⁶

Wife conducting own business. The mere fact that the wife conducts a business of her own which contributes to the support of the family is not conclusive that she is the head of the family.⁶⁷ However, where it is shown that the wife's business is the family's sole support, and that she herself directs it, her position in the family as its head is established,⁶⁸ and her right to exemption is not affected by the fact that her husband lives with her and that he gives his time and attention to the conducting of his wife's business.⁶⁹

Under a statute which makes it the legal duty of a wife to support her husband when he has no separate property, and is unable, from infirmity, to support himself, a married woman who supports her infirm husband can claim her property as exempt as the head of the family.⁷⁰ In some states there have been similar decisions, without regard to any statute making it the duty of a wife to support her husband.⁷¹ In other states it has been decided that a wife living with her husband cannot be the head of a family so as to be entitled to claim an exemption as such, although her husband is unable to work, and she supports him and their children.⁷²

Insanity of a husband does not, per se, confer headship of the family on the wife,⁷³ but it may render the wife the proper person to claim, select, and hold the exemptions allowed him.⁷⁴

Husband's absence. Where the husband is temporarily or permanently absent from the home, so that the maintenance and support of the family devolves on the wife, she is entitled to the exemption as the head of the family.⁷⁵

Husband's failure to assert claim. There are provisions allowing a wife to claim the exemptions to which her husband is entitled on his failure or refusal to make the claim.⁷⁶ Where there is such a provision as this, and also a statute allowing a firm to claim an exemption in the partnership property, the wife of a partner may assert such claim if her husband fails or refuses to do so.⁷⁷

Title to exempt property. Statutes permitting the wife to claim exemption as head of a family do not change or affect the title to the property; it remains the property of the husband, and the wife merely has the right to the possession of it as against his creditors,⁷⁸ so that a sale by her of specific articles exempted is a conversion of the husband's property by the wife, and she is not protected from a new levy by a creditor of the husband, even under the same attachment;⁷⁹ nor does an appraisal, after the creditor has dismissed his attachment on the wife's filing an inventory and claiming exemption, change the title of the exempt property from the husband to the wife.⁸⁰ The wife, although not herself entitled to an exemption as head of a family, may have an interest as beneficiary in an exemption set apart to the husband, on his application for the benefit of the wife.⁸¹

(2) Absconding Debtor

When a debtor absconds and abandons his wife, she may claim her own property as exempt if she assumes the position of head of the family, and according to some authorities she may make any claim of exemption that her husband might have made; she may also claim under special statutory provisions covering such circumstances, but such statutes do not give a double exemption, the benefit of which both husband and wife may claim.

When a husband absconds and abandons his wife, and she continues to carry on the household and support the family, she is the head of the family, and may, as such, claim her own property as exempt.⁸² Although there is authority denying the wife of an absconding debtor the right of exemption where she does not establish her status as head of a family,⁸³ it has also been held that she may maintain a claim of exemption that her husband might have made,⁸⁴ under the theory that the exemption laws are for the benefit of the debtor's family and are to be liberally construed to that end,⁸⁵ unless under particular statutes the right of exemption has been lost by reason of the husband's conduct.⁸⁶ An intention on the part of the head of the family to abscond from one part of the state to another will not deprive the family of the exemption privilege.⁸⁷

The wife of an absconding debtor may in many jurisdictions claim the right of exemption under special statutory provisions intended to govern such a case.⁸⁸ To bring the wife of a debtor within such statutes, it is not necessary that he shall have deserted his family or left without their knowledge or consent, but it is enough if he has absconded to escape from the jurisdiction or to avoid the process of the courts.⁸⁹ Under the statute her right to her husband's exemption becomes fixed at the time she makes the claim,⁹⁰ and his subsequent return with the express purpose of defeating her claim by appearing in the attachment proceeding and waiving exemption does not deprive her of the right.⁹¹

The wife ordinarily cannot claim the benefit of the statute where the husband has not absconded but has disposed of his property in good faith in anticipation of a penitentiary sentence;⁹² but under a statute providing that a wife may claim the statutory exemptions to which her husband is entitled when he "has absconded or absented himself from his place of abode" a wife may claim the exemptions to which her husband is entitled even when his absence is due to causes beyond his control, as where he is confined to jail, and her right is not affected by the fact that the claim might also have been made by the husband.⁹³ Such a statute, however, does not give a double exemption to husband and wife, the benefit of which both may claim.⁹⁴

Under statutes exempting specific property or money in lieu thereof a wife of an absconding debtor is entitled to the money exemption, where her husband did not have the specific articles.⁹⁵

§ 20. — Unmarried Persons

Unmarried persons may be the heads of families if they have children or other relatives dependent on them for support and if they reside with them.

While the husband and father primarily is the head of the family, as discussed supra § 17 a, he is not necessarily its head.⁹⁶ While an unmarried person, with no one dependent on him, is not the head of a family although he may keep house and have servants,⁹⁷ unmarried persons, whether men or women, may be the heads of families if they have children or other relatives dependent on them for support.⁹⁸ However, an unmarried debtor who merely contributes to the support of kin who do not reside with him has been held not to be the head of the family.⁹⁹ Some statutes define "head of a family" in terms to include other family relationships in which the element of moral, as well as legal, obligation to support enters.¹

§ 21. — Support of Dependent Females

Under some statutes an exemption may be claimed by one who, although not the head of a family, has the care and support of dependent females of any age.

In some jurisdictions provision is specifically made for an exemption in favor of those who, although not the head of a family, have the care and support of dependent females of any age.² A married woman may be entitled to such exemption.³

§ 22. — "Aged and Infirm Persons"

In some states every "aged or infirm person" who is not the head of a family may claim exemption.

In some states an exemption is allowed by the constitution to every "aged or infirm person" who is not the head of a family.⁴ While the term "aged" as applied to human beings is not for all purposes susceptible of a precise definition, and while it is not practicable arbitrarily to fix the period of life at which the condition of being aged can be said to have certainly begun, the provision can be said to apply to those who are old in years regardless of their physical condition, and the problem of how old a person must be to be aged under the constitution, in the absence of a more specific constitutional or statutory definition, can be met only by an ap-

§ 23. — Surviving Husband, Wife, Children, and Next of Kin

- a. In general
- b. Widow
- c. Children or heirs

a. In General

Some statutes provide that property exempt during the lifetime of a debtor shall continue so for the benefit of his widow and surviving children, but, unless a statute continues exemption rights in favor of a surviving husband, his rights depend solely on his status as a member or head of a family and they terminate on the deaths of the other members of the family.

Under a number of the statutes, property exempt during the lifetime of a debtor continues so for the benefit of his widow and surviving children.⁶ The only exemption continued may be the homestead exemption, as discussed in Homesteads § 243, and there may be no provision for continuing the personal property exemption.⁷ Whether an exemption is granted not only for the benefit of the class of persons specified but also for the benefit of their distributees or beneficiaries depends on the intention of the legislative body as evidenced by the particular exemption statute.⁸ Where the exemption is continued in such property as would be exempt to the decedent as head of the family, property which decedent might have claimed as exempt on other grounds is not included.⁹ A statute merely entitling a widow to retain certain property of her deceased husband free from any of his debts does not entitle her to exemption of such property from liability for her individual debts.¹⁰

Where the exempt property of the decedent has been exchanged for other property, the widow and children have been held to have acquired the same rights in the property received in exchange;¹¹ and where the exempt property has been sold under attachment, the proceeds in court, undistributed at the death of the debtor, have been held to pass to the widow and children.¹² Where, by agreement between the interested parties, the proceeds from a sale of property claimed by the widow and child as exempt occupy the same status as the property itself, the court may not impose any condition limiting the use of such proceeds, because to do so would be to prejudice the rights of the parties contrary to the agreement,^{12.5} nor may the court require that

(1) Statute providing that intestate's estate shall vest immediately in his heirs at law, subject to payment of debts except such as may be exempted by law, was not intended to continue affirmatively in favor of heirs every exemption which legislature might see fit to declare in favor of individual, whether head of a family or not, but was intended to declare that all property should vest subject to such exemptions as were by other statutory provisions continued after death of one in whose favor exemption had been created.

Purpose of statute

Purpose of statute is to make provision for support and maintenance of family, those demands of family being deemed superior to those of heirs or creditors, and statute should be liberally construed to obtain its objectives.

security be given to assure the ultimate return of the property to the estate.^{12,10} Under a provision that when the debtor dies his widow is entitled to the exempt property for the use of herself and children of the deceased, the widow becomes the trustee for herself and children as the common beneficiaries,¹³ and the fund, although held in common by the widow and children, is not subject to partition where it appears that the widow is still living and the children are adult and living apart from her.¹⁴ Under such statutes, in default of children, the widow takes the exempt property absolutely.¹⁵

Surviving husband. Under some statutes the husband's right to exemption seems to be based entirely on provisions of law granting him such right as a member of a family, as a debtor with a family or head of a family, or as a householder, as discussed supra §§ 16-18. Accordingly in the absence of statute an exemption of personal property from forced sale, while the debtor has a family, does not continue in his favor, after the other members of the family are dead.¹⁶ The debtor's exemption rights after death of his wife are still dependent upon his status as head of the family or householder, and are not derived from any statutory or constitutional provision granting an exemption to a surviving husband as such.¹⁷ However, in some statutes, express provision is made for a continuance of exemption rights in favor of a surviving husband.¹⁸

The right of exemption of a deceased husband which survives to his widow must be claimed by her within a reasonable time after his death, but her right is not affected by her owning other separate property, or by the fact that she had been abandoned by her husband and lived apart from him. Under some statutes the widow acquires absolute title to the exempt property, but under other statutes she acquires a qualified title, good only as against creditors and not as against legatees or distributees.

Where the widow wishes to take the benefit of the statute continuing the exemption allowed her deceased husband in his lifetime, she must claim her right within a reasonable time after the death of her husband.¹⁹ However, as soon as she has made her claim, her right to property exempt from execution vests by operation of law and is not affected by the fact that the property has not been formally set off to her;²⁰ nor is her right to exemption under these statutes affected by her owning other separate property,²¹ or by her receiving from the estate of the deceased other property as her distributive share;²² but, under a statute so providing, a widow who is a devisee under will is not entitled to exempt property.²³

A widow is entitled to her exemption even though she had not been a part of her husband's household for some time prior to his death where it is shown that he abandoned her;²⁴ but she is not entitled to her exemption where she had separated from her husband without cause.²⁵

Under some statutes the widow's exemption gives her title to the exempt property absolutely²⁶ so that she becomes entitled to it as against the administrator,²⁷ legatees and distributees,²⁸ and heirs,²⁹ as well as against creditors of the deceased. Under other statutes, the widow's title to exempt property is a qualified title only, good only as against creditors,³⁰ and not good against legatees or distributees.³¹ In these jurisdictions, where the distinction between an absolute and qualified title is made, statutes which give an absolute title as against creditors and legatees to certain specific articles will be construed strictly to apply only to the articles named.³² In any event, her title to the exempt property is good as against a trustee in bankruptcy of deceased,³³ and it matters not whether her husband was solvent or insolvent at the time of his death.³⁴

Statutes providing that "property exempt . . . shall not go to the executor or administrator," show that the benefit is intended not only for the widows of those dying intestate, but of those dying testate, and also that the benefit is secured without regard to the size or solvency of the estate.³⁵ Some statutes limit a widow's right to exemption to the period of her widowhood.³⁶

Under some statutes the surviving children succeed to the debtor's right of exemption, while under other statutes, the heirs, rather than the children as such, succeed to the right.

Under the statutes the exemption may be continued in favor of the widow only,³⁷ or in favor of the widow and children.³⁸ In the latter case, the children of a debtor who dies leaving no widow have the full benefit of the exemption law.³⁹

The debtor's stepchildren are within the terms of a statute continuing the debtor's exemption to his surviving children,⁴⁰ but some statutes expressly provide that, as between a widowed stepmother and the debtor's own children, the children shall be entitled to their father's exemption as against their stepmother.⁴¹ On the death of the widow there remains nothing of her interest in the property to which her second husband can lay claim, as against her children by her first husband.⁴²

In jurisdictions requiring residence of the claimant within the state, the status of the surviving children of the deceased debtor is determined by their residence at the time of their father's death;⁴³ and if, at that time, the children are residents of the state they will be entitled to the exemption.⁴⁴ The exemption can be enjoyed by the children, however, only as long as they are surviving members of the family, and this status is lost, and with it the exemption privilege, when they have been adopted into the family of another.⁴⁵

Age, dependence, or marriage of children. Under some statutes the exemption can be enjoyed by the children during their minority only,⁴⁶ and the creditors are entitled to the exempt property on the marriage or coming of age of the children.⁴⁷ In such cases the rights of all parties are best conserved by the courts administering the estate through a receiver appointed for the purpose, who pays the usufruct from time to time to the guardian of the infants, and holds the corpus for the benefit of the creditors after the termination of the infants' interests in the property.⁴⁸

Under other statutes the dependence and age of the children are immaterial,⁴⁹ and the only facts that need be shown are the family relation and the residence with decedent.⁵⁰ It has even been held under such statutes that a surviving child may claim the right to exemption although his father or mother in their lifetime was dependent on him for their support.⁵¹

Grandchildren. Grandchildren are not entitled as "children," to their grandfather's exemption, unless they are living with him as members of his family at the time of his death.⁵²

§ 24. — Persons Engaged in Particular Occupation

- a. In general
- b. Habitual occupation or use
- c. Suspension or abandonment of trade or occupation
- d. Particular trades or occupations

a. In General

Where exemptions are provided for the benefit of persons in particular employments, trades, or businesses, a person may claim the exemption only when he is engaged in the specified occupation at the time the levy is made and the trade or business is not unlawful at the time the exemption is claimed.

Exemptions are provided in some jurisdictions for the benefit of persons in particular employments, trades, or businesses.⁵⁵ When the statute is so restricted a person can claim the exemption only when he is engaged in the specified occupation.⁵⁶ Where the statute is not in express terms restricted to persons engaged in particular occupations but is restricted rather to articles and classes of property which are most used in certain occupations, the question of whether the exemption is restricted to such occupations is one dependent on the legislative intent.⁵⁷ Any implication to that effect, however, may be negated by express provisions of a later amending or supplemental statute extending the benefits of the law to a larger class of debtors.⁵⁸ Even when a statute uses general terms, it may appear that the legislature intended to confine the benefit of the law to particular persons, and if such is the case the intention of the legislature must govern.⁵⁹

Time of inquiry as to trade or occupation. The time to which the inquiry as to a debtor's occupation or employment relates, for the purpose of determining his right to an exemption, is the time when the property claimed as exempt was levied on.⁶⁰ A mere unexecuted intention formed by the debtor to adopt another trade or calling will not entitle him to claim the exemptions relating thereto.⁶¹ To claim an exemption as a lawyer, the debtor does not necessarily have to be engaged in the practice of law at the very time a levy is made on his property; it is enough if he belongs to the profession and intends to use the property in his profession.⁶²

Unlawful trade or occupation. Statutes exempting property to enable a person to carry on his trade or business are not to be construed as exempting property kept or used by a person in carrying on an unlawful trade or business.⁶³ The trade must be a lawful one,⁶⁴ and it must be lawful at the time the exemption is claimed.⁶⁵

b. Habitual Occupation or Use

Where the statute so provides, the person claiming the exemption must show that he is "habitually" engaged in the prescribed occupation, or makes "habitual" use of the exempted articles; the word "habitually" does not mean exclusively, but customarily.

Under statutes which qualify their grant of exemption privileges to persons "habitually" engaged in certain occupations, or making "habitual" use of the exempted articles, only persons so designated may claim exemptions.⁶⁶ In the absence of such a statutory requirement it has been held that habitual use is not necessary.⁶⁷

Where there is such a provision, the implements, to be exempt, need not be used exclusively in the business by which the debtor habitually earns his living, for the word "habitually" does not mean exclusively, but customarily;⁶⁸ nor is the right to the exemption defeated by the fact that the debtor derives some revenue from other industries.⁶⁹ One who has merely made a start in his business, but with intention to be engaged in it "habitually," is entitled to his exemption.⁷⁰

c. Suspension or Abandonment of Trade or Occupation

The right to claim an exemption as one who is engaged in a particular occupation is lost if the debtor permanently abandons such occupation, but the right is not lost if he merely suspends his occupation intending to return to it when he has the opportunity.

A debtor loses his right to claim an exemption as one who is engaged in a particular occupation if he permanently abandons such occupation.⁷¹ It is otherwise, however, if he merely suspends his trade or occupation intending to return to it when he has the opportunity,⁷² although it has been held that such a suspension must be accompanied by a retention of the implements or stock in trade for use when the trade is resumed.⁷³

A temporary suspension of trade in order to move it from one location to another is not evidence of abandonment of the business so as to remove the appliances used therein from the protection of the exemption statute.⁷⁴ A person does not forfeit his right to exemptions as a member of a trade because, while seeking in good faith an opportunity to engage therein, he accepts some other employment to earn a living for himself and family.⁷⁵

Abandonment is shown by acts evidencing an intention to abandon,⁷⁶ as where the debtor conceives the design of absconding,⁷⁷ and it is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence in each case.⁷⁸ The length of time which has elapsed since a temporary suspension of one's calling is an element to be considered in determining whether it has been abandoned.⁷⁹

- (8) Persons engaged in trade
- (9) "Seamen"
- (10) "Teamsters" and "truckmen"
- (11) "Other persons," "other laborers," "other tradesmen," etc.

(1) "Clerks," "Employees," or "Wage Earners"

An independent contractor or one employed on a salary and commissions to sell goods is not a "clerk" within an exemption statute. The term "employee" includes superintendents and salesmen, and the term "wage earner" comprehends persons whose services require physical or manual labor.

Where the statute confers exemptions on persons specifically described as clerks, an independent contractor is not included,⁸⁰ nor is one employed on a salary and commissions to sell goods.⁸¹

"Employees" or "wage earners." The term "employee" which is used in some statutes is a broader term than "laborer," and includes superintendents⁸² and salesmen.⁸³

Some statutes provide for exemption of wages of a "wage earner," and under the statute one is a wage earner whose services require physical or manual labor whether skilled or unskilled.⁸⁴

(2) "Farmers" and "Persons Engaged in Agriculture"

Within exemption statutes, the term "farmer" includes anyone who earns his living by farming, even though temporarily not engaged in that occupation; and a person is "engaged in agriculture" if he derives support for himself and family, in whole or in part, from the tillage of the fields.

Where the statute exempts the property of "farmers" or of persons "engaged in agriculture," the term "farmer" includes anyone who earns his living by farming,⁸⁵ even though he is temporarily not engaged in that occupation,⁸⁶ nor need he devote his time exclusively to such occupation.⁸⁷ The status of a person as a farmer is not changed by the fact that his farm is sold at a judicial sale if he intends to continue farming as his occupation.⁸⁸

A person is "engaged in agriculture" when he derives the support of himself and family, in whole or in part, from the tillage of the fields; he must cultivate something more than a garden, although it may be much less than a farm.⁸⁹

Laborers engaged in raising a crop are given exemption rights in some states, but only those who are not heads of families are entitled under the terms of the statute granting the exemption.⁹⁰

(3) "Laborers"

The exemption given under some statutes to "laborers" may be claimed only by such persons as perform manual or menial services, under the direction of a superior, and not by independent contractors, or overseers or superintendents who do no labor themselves; the authorities disagree as to whether clerks, bookkeepers, and stenographers are "laborers."

It may be laid down as a general rule that statutes giving to "laborers" or a "laboring man or woman" the right to claim wages or other property as exempt are to be construed as having reference to such persons only as perform manual or menial services, and such as are responsible for no independent action, but do a day's work or a stated job under the direction of a superior.⁹¹ In some of the cases a distinction is made between a laborer and an artisan depending on the amount of skill required in the work as related to the physical effort; where little physical effort is required but great skill, the workman is an artisan but not a laborer within the meaning of the statute.⁹² The mere fact that an employee's wages are payable monthly, weekly, or even daily, or that they are subject to deduction for loss of time, does not make him a

Clerks, bookkeepers, and stenographers. Whether clerks, bookkeepers, stenographers, etc., in stores and offices are to be regarded as laborers within the meaning of laws exempting wages due to laborers, is not clear, and the decisions on the question are conflicting; in some jurisdictions persons engaged in these occupations are not regarded as laborers.¹⁶ Other courts, while considering such statutes as applying only to employees engaged in doing manual labor, have construed this term more broadly, and have held that bookkeepers and clerks in stores and offices could be regarded as performing manual labor, so as to bring them within the spirit and intent of the statute,¹⁷ holding even that a bookkeeper who also performs the services of a stenographer and private secretary is a laborer within the statute;¹⁸ while the same courts, in other decisions, have held that a clerk in a mercantile establishment is, primarily, not a laborer, but that whether or not, in a particular case, he is so, depends on the character of his service.¹⁹

Contractors. The term "laborers" does not apply to contractors who do no manual work themselves but merely furnish the labor and services of others, or who perform work, under a contract, independently and not under the direction and control of another person.²⁰

Overseers and superintendents. It has been held that the term "laborer" does not include overseers and superintendents,²¹ although a distinction has been made between overseers of plantations, paid by the day, who not only direct the operations of the hands employed, but labor with them,²² and superintendents or heads of departments who receive monthly salaries and do no manual labor.²³

Mere employment and supervision of other laborers by a person who is himself employed to perform manual labor, and who does himself perform such labor, does not deprive him of the character of a laborer.²⁴

(4) "Mechanics"

The term "mechanic" within exemption laws includes those persons who work with tools, machines, or instruments, and does not embrace those persons engaged in professions or in the liberal arts, or capitalists and owners of machinery and factories who do not themselves work as mechanics.

The term "mechanic" as employed in an exemption statute is to be liberally construed,²⁵ as including those who work with tools, machines, or instruments,²⁶ whether master mechanics or journeymen.²⁷ A mechanic need not be employed as a journeyman to entitle him to the exemption.²⁸ One may be a mechanic, although he engages incidentally in other work,²⁹ or although he has only recently become a mechanic and has no great amount of skill.³⁰

The term "mechanic" does not include persons engaged in professions,³¹ such as surgeons or dentists,³² or optometrists,³³ or abstracters of title,³⁴ although the tools used in particular professions have been held to be properly exempt as "mechanical tools," as discussed infra § 46. The term "mechanics" does not include persons engaged in the liberal arts and similar occupations, such as photographers³⁵ or architects' draughtsmen.³⁶

Capitalists and owners of machinery and factories are not mechanics.³⁷ However, a person who himself works with tools and with his own hands is a mechanic within the meaning of the exemption laws, notwithstanding he owns and superintends the factory in which he works, and also employs others to work in it.³⁸ That one is both a mechanic and a manufacturer does not prevent him from claiming his exemption as a mechanic.³⁹

(5) "Peddlers"

Under a statute so providing, the team or other property of a peddler may be exempt, even though he does odd jobs for hire.

Under some statutes the team or other property of a peddler is exempt.⁴⁰ A mere delivery service for another's business does not constitute the person who makes the deliveries a peddler within the meaning of the statute,⁴¹ but mere odd jobs for hire, done by one who habitually earns his living by peddling, will not deprive him of his exemption rights as a peddler.⁴²

(6) Persons Engaged in Business or Occupation

Exemptions conferred with reference to the debtor's "business," "trade or business," or "occupation" generally apply to any employment or occupation in which a person is engaged to procure a living.

By some statutes exemptions are conferred with reference to the debtor's "business," "trade or business," or "occupation."⁴³ These expressions are broader in their meaning than "trade" and denote any employment or occupation in which a person is engaged to procure a living.⁴⁴ The term is even used to include work in which a debtor is engaged, incidental or supplemental to his principal trade.⁴⁵ On the other hand, it has been held that the business of a contractor is not an "occupation" within the meaning of the statute.⁴⁶ A married woman may be entitled to an exemption of this character, although her husband may be entitled to claim exemptions as the head of the family.⁴⁷

(7) Persons Engaged in Profession

To come within an exemption statute expressly applying to lawyers, physicians, etc., the debtor must have a knowledge of his profession to some extent. The term "profession," as used in some statutes, has sometimes been broadly construed to include any occupation or employment not mechanical or agricultural, or the like.

In some states there are exemption statutes applying in express terms to lawyers, physicians, etc., and, except where the statute so requires,⁴⁸ it is not necessary that the lawyer or physician should also be head of a family to entitle him to the exemption privilege.⁴⁹ It is, however, necessary that he should have a knowledge of his profession to some extent, although no particular degree of skill is required in the practice of it.⁵⁰ An optometrist is not entitled to an exemption as a "physician" or "surgeon."⁵¹ Under a statute giving exemptions to lawyers, a lawyer who combines the practice of his profession with other business is nevertheless entitled to his exemption as a lawyer.⁵²

The term "profession" has also been broadly construed to include any occupation or employment not mechanical or agricultural, or the like, to which one devotes himself.⁵³ It has been held, however, that the business of a contractor is not a "profession" within the meaning of a statute exempting tools and implements.⁵⁴ It has been held that an undertaker is not a professional man.⁵⁵

(8) Persons Engaged in Trade

While the statutory exemption for persons engaged in "trade" is restricted by some courts to persons in mechanical pursuits, other courts broadly construe the term as equivalent to occupation, employment, or business.

By some courts the word "trade," as used in statutes exempting the property of persons engaged in trade, is restricted to mechanical pursuits.⁵⁶ Other courts, however, construe the term in a broader sense as equivalent to occupation, employment, or business.⁵⁷

The term has been variously construed to include a baker,⁵⁸ a blacksmith,⁵⁹ a butcher,⁶⁰ a carpenter,⁶¹ an insurance agent,⁶² an operator of a school bus,⁶³ a person whose business is the running of a threshing machine,⁶⁴ a saddle and harness maker,⁶⁵ one who owns and operates a moving picture show,⁶⁶ or a photographer.⁶⁷

On the other hand, the term has been held not to include a contractor,⁶⁸ or a manufacturer who is not a mere mechanic,⁶⁹ or a teamster or carrier,⁷⁰ or a warehouseman.⁷¹

Merchants. By some courts a merchant is held to be a tradesman;⁷² by others a contrary view is taken.⁷³ However, the fact that one who is engaged in a trade within the statute himself sells the product of his industry does not make him any the less entitled to his exemption so far as it relates to his trade,⁷⁴ while, on the other hand, it will not be extended to implements used by him in the sale of the goods which he has made.⁷⁵ This distinction is maintained, even though he makes very few articles, and buys most of the articles sold in his shop.⁷⁶

Professions. The term "trade" has been construed not to include the learned professions, such as that of physicians and surgeons,⁷⁷ dentists,⁷⁸ or optometrists.⁷⁹

(9) "Seamen"

While some state courts do not apply the federal statute of exemption for seamen to seamen operating on coastwise vessels, otherwise than between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, federal courts apply the statute to all seamen.

Seamen are protected by a federal statute, exempting their wages and property.⁸⁰ It has been held in some of the state courts that the statute does not apply to seamen operating on coastwise vessels, otherwise than between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.⁸¹ Federal courts, however, have held that a seaman's wages are exempt, whether or not he is engaged in the coasting trade.⁸² In other jurisdictions it has been held that a seaman in the coasting trade is entitled to an exemption in his wages provided he was shipped by a shipping commissioner, but not otherwise.⁸³

A fisherman is not a seaman within the meaning of the statute,⁸⁴ but an employee on an interstate ferryboat may be.⁸⁵ A pilot,⁸⁶ or a longshoreman employed to stow cargo in, and discharge cargo from, the holds of a ship while it lies in navigable waters⁸⁷ is a "seaman" within the statute, but the master or captain of a vessel is not a "seaman."⁸⁸

(10) "Teamsters" and "Truckmen"

Within various exemption statutes, a "teamster" is a person who is engaged with his own team in the business of hauling freight for other persons for a consideration, and who habitually earns his living thereby. A married woman may be entitled to exemption as a truckman.

A "teamster," within the meaning of a statute exempting the horses and wagon by which a teamster habitually earns his living, is a person who is engaged with his own team in the business of hauling freight for other persons for a consideration, and who habitually earns his living thereby; every one who drives a team is not necessarily a teamster in the sense of the statute but he must be engaged in that business.⁸⁹ To claim the benefits of these statutes a claimant must himself be a teamster; it is not sufficient that he furnishes the capital to start another in the teaming business.⁹⁰ He himself need not, however, necessarily drive, nor need he be engaged in the business continually.⁹¹ A teamster may do hauling or team work outside the state without forfeiting his rights under the exemption law.⁹²

A married woman who owns a truck which her husband drives and by which she actually earns a living may be entitled to an exemption as a truckman.⁹³

(11) "Other Persons," "Other Laborers," "Other Tradesmen," Etc.

Generally, the statutory exemptions for "other person," "other laborer," etc. do not necessarily include all persons not specifically enumerated, but only such persons as are within the spirit and general intent of the statute; unless a different legislative intent is expressed, the person claiming exemption must be of the same kind as those enumerated.

The words "other person," "other laborer," etc., in a statute exempting property of any person engaged in specified occupations, "or other person," etc. do not necessarily include all persons not specially enumerated, but they include such persons only as are within the spirit and general intent of the statute,⁹⁴ so that, where one subdivision of an exemption statute refers specifically to persons in a particular occupation, they will not be included under the term "other person," contained in another subdivision of the same statute.⁹⁵ Under the general rules of statutory construction, such terms are generally restricted to persons of the same kind as those enumerated.⁹⁶ The term "other laborer," as used in an exemption statute, may include one whose work is in connection with his own business and not as an employee working for wages or salary.^{96.5}

Although the words "other laborer," if taken alone, would refer to those only who are engaged in physical labor, see supra subdivision d (3) of this section, the term may be enlarged to include those engaged in mental labor, and will be, if the classes of persons enumerated, in connection with which the term is used, include those who are engaged in mental labor.⁹⁷

While the scope of the term "other person" or "other laborer" or "other tradesman" is generally determined by the enumeration of classes specifically referred to, it may be still further restricted by other provisions in the statute.⁹⁸ Where the intention of the legislature, disclosed by other parts of the same statute or by other statutes, is obviously not to restrict the operation of the words "other person" to persons of the same kind as those enumerated, the court will not construe the statute as having that effect.⁹⁹

However, it has been held that a statute granting exemption to a cart or truck by the use of which a cartman, drayman, or other laborer actually earns his living is intended to refer to the person actually driving the dray or truck and thereby earning his living. Accordingly, one who owns three trucks and rents them out to others at stated prices per day or per cubic yard of material hauled is neither a drayman nor a truckman within the meaning of the statute.

§ 25. — Persons in Military or Naval Service

Statutes giving exemptions to persons in the military service of the state do not apply to persons in the military service of the United States and persons in the naval service are not entitled to the benefit of a statute exempting soldiers in actual military service.

In some states exemptions are given to persons in the military service of the state.¹ Under these statutes, persons mustered into the military service of the United States are not within the statute, even though the military force is raised to protect the frontier of the state, and in response to a requisition by the federal government to the governor of the state.² A person in the naval service is not entitled to the benefit of a statute exempting the property of "soldiers in actual military service."³

III. PROPERTY EXEMPT

A. NATURE AND CHARACTER

1. IN GENERAL

§ 26. General Statement

The nature and character of the property which a debtor may claim as exempt are determined and limited by the exemption statute; and the right to an exemption is to be determined as of the date of the seizure.

The nature and character of the property which a debtor may claim as exempt are determined by the exemption statute, and the exemption is limited to the particular kind of property, or the specific articles, which the statute prescribes,⁴ and then only to the value limited.⁵ The right to an exemption is to be determined as of the date of the seizure⁶ and with reference to the condition of things then existing.⁷

The conversion of nonexempt to exempt property does not of itself invest a creditor with the right to reach such property.⁸

§ 27. "Personal Property" or "Property" under General Clauses

Under a statute exempting "personal property," the debtor may select such personal property as he sees fit, provided it does not exceed the value limited.

Under a statute exempting "personal property" generally to a certain amount, to be selected by the debtor, he may claim any he may see fit, provided it is personal property⁹ and does not exceed the limitation as to value.¹⁰ Where such a statute uses the term "property" only, the range of selection includes debts, earnings, salaries, wages, income from trust funds, and profits,¹¹ and, as appears infra § 30, real property. Within the meaning of a statute exempting "any other property . . . or debts," the rent answered as owing to a judgment defendant by a garnishee tenant constitutes both "property" and "debts."^{11.5}

§ 28. — Choses in Action

Although there is some authority to the contrary, the term "personal property" in exemption statutes is generally held to include choses in action.

The term "personal property" is generally held to include choses in action, whether in statutes making an absolute exemption of a certain amount of property or in statutes allowing the debtor to select a certain amount of property, either generally or in lieu of certain articles specifically exempt.¹² However, in some cases the courts have construed an exemption of "personal property" to be limited to tangible property and not to include choses in action;¹³ and under a statute so providing an exemption cannot be taken in money due.¹⁴

Exemptions under a general clause exempting personal property have been held to include a note,¹⁵ money due from a bank¹⁶ or from an insurance company on an insurance policy,¹⁷ or a debt due from any other person.¹⁸ A legatee or distributee may claim his exemption out of his share of the decedent's estate,¹⁹ but not as against the debts which he owes the estate.²⁰ Rents and profits of a life estate,²¹ and even a vested expectant interest of a debtor in a sum of money payable at his own death, or at the death of another person,²² may be claimed to be exempt as "personal property" under the statute. A judgment, although a mere chose in action, is "personal property" within the meaning of the statutes of exemption.²³ An equity of redemption in personal property may be claimed by the debtor as exempt,²⁴ subject, however, according to at least one authority, to the qualification that he has no other property which he can claim as exempt.²⁵

§ 29. — Money

In the absence of a statutory or constitutional prohibition, the debtor may claim his exemption of "personal property" in money, and even out of money in the custody of the law.

A judgment debtor has been held entitled to claim exemption of money on deposit in the bank;^{25.50} and in the absence of a constitutional or statutory provision forbidding it,²⁶ a debtor may claim his exemption of "personal property" in money.²⁷ Under a statute so providing, there can be no valid allowance of cash as an exemption unless the order of court provides for its investment in personal property;²⁸ but this provision is not applicable where the property exempted is an interest in a judgment.²⁹ Where the property levied on consists of real estate and the debtor elects to retain the amount exempt to him therefrom, and the property cannot be divided without injury to the whole, the debtor may, under authorizing statute, receive the amount of his exemption in money from the proceeds of the sale.³⁰

"Money due the debtor," as excepted by statute from property which may be exempt, includes

Under exemption statute providing that exemption shall not be allowed from any money due debtor, a bankrupt by virtue of stock ownership in a corporation was not a "creditor" of the corporation as respects right to claim exemption of stock in bankruptcy proceeding, since stock certificate shows an undivided interest in the assets of the corporation and is not a credit or a debt owing by the corporation to the stockholders in a sense in which the term is generally used.

Money in custody of law. Under some authorities, the debtor may claim his exemption out of money in the custody of the law, as, for instance, out of a fund paid into court,³¹ or money in the hands of the sheriff³² or receiver.³³ A debtor who has failed to make his selection of specific property to which he is entitled as exempt will not be allowed an exemption in the proceeds of its sale;³⁴ but this rule appears not to be applicable where the debtor is not guilty of laches.³⁵

Although exemption cannot be claimed, as a general rule, against a mortgage in the foreclosure thereof, see infra § 106, it is held that the exemption may be allowed out of the surplus proceeds of the sale.³⁶

"Money and debts due." Where a shifting stock of merchandise of a debtor is destroyed by fire, the debtor's claim to the proceeds of a policy of fire insurance on the merchandise becomes fixed and is entitled to be claimed as exempt from execution as "moneys and debts due," to the statutory amount, notwithstanding the stock of merchandise is itself not exempt.^{36.5}

§ 30. — Real Property

The term "property" in an exemption statute includes real property.

When the statute in terms exempts "personal property" only, a debtor cannot claim real property,³⁷ but where the general statute exempts "property" to a certain value, and allows the debtor to select either real or personal property, the debtor may claim his entire exemption out of real estate levied on, even though he may own personal property.³⁸

2. SPECIFIC EXEMPTIONS

§ 31. In General

Under empowering statutes, the proceeds of a judgment for personal injuries or of disability insurance may be exempt; but a statutory exemption of the proceeds of a life insurance policy is generally held inapplicable to disability benefits received under such a policy.

Under a statute so providing, the proceeds of a judgment for personal injuries are exempt,³⁹ but such statute does not apply to a recovery under the disability provisions of an indemnity contract.⁴⁰

Disability insurance. In the absence of a statute so providing, the proceeds realized under a policy of disability insurance or under the disability provision of a life insurance policy are not exempt.⁴¹ Although there is some authority to the contrary,⁴² it is generally held that a statutory exemption of the proceeds of a life insurance policy does not apply to disability benefits received under such a policy.⁴³ It has been held that, under a statute exempting the "proceeds and avails" of a life insurance policy in certain cases, the proceeds under the disability clause of such a policy are exempt,⁴⁴ but there is authority to the contrary.⁴⁵ In any event, the exemption of disability benefits is no broader than that accorded death benefits payable under the policy, and where a statute does not exempt death benefits, if payable to insured, disability benefits, if payable to insured, are not exempt.⁴⁶

A statute exempting the proceeds of disability insurance applies to money realized under the disability provisions of a life insurance policy.⁴⁷

A radio is not a musical instrument within a statute exempting such property.⁴⁸

A television set, likewise, is not exempt as a musical instrument.^{48.5}

Children's playthings, except possibly those that are uncommon and overly expensive, have been held exempt under general statutory language.^{48.10}

A merchant's commercial books have been considered exempt from sale under execution.^{48.15}

Building and loan association stock. An exemption of the "shares of stock" in a building and loan association has been considered to refer to an aliquot part of the total stock of an association, and not to refer to withdrawable accumulative shares issued by such an association.^{48.20}

Trust funds. If the statute so provides, a judgment creditor is precluded from proceeding by way of execution against income from trust funds owing to the debtor which does not exceed a certain sum per week.^{48.25}

§ 32. Arms and Accoutrements

Under statutes so providing, arms and accoutrements may be exempt.

Arms are not exempt unless made so by statute.⁴⁹ Under statutes so providing, the arms and accoutrements or equipment of militiamen are exempt.⁵⁰ Under such a statute the arms of an artilleryman are exempt;⁵¹ but a horse and saddle owned by a cavalryman are not exempt under a statute exempting a militiaman's uniform, arms, ammunition, and accoutrements.⁵² Under a statute exempting "the troop horse of each trooper, duly entered and registered with the captain of the troop," a horse "duly entered and registered" is exempt.⁵³ A statute exempting "such military arms and accoutrements as the debtor is required by law to furnish" is of a temporary character, as applied to individuals, and continues as long only as the debtor is bound by law to furnish arms and accoutrements; when the obligation ceases, the exemption ceases.⁵⁴

§ 33. Burial Lots; Property of Cemetery

Under statutes so providing in varying terms, burial grounds and cemetery lands may be exempt.

Under statutes so providing, a debtor may have an exemption in land which is set apart and used as burial ground.⁵⁵ Under particular statutes the exemption may be limited to private or family burying grounds,⁵⁶ or extended to lots or interests in public burying grounds.⁵⁷ Under some statutes the exemption is given in broad terms to all debtors,⁵⁸ and under such statutes cemetery lands owned by a cemetery association are exempt;⁵⁹ or the exemption may be restricted to heads of families.⁶⁰ It is generally required that the lands be set apart or in actual use for burial purposes in order to be exempt.⁶¹

It has been said that it is impossible to reconcile the state's policy to "preserve and maintain the burial places of the dead" with any policy permitting the levy and sale of any part of a cemetery company's personal property which is necessary for the care and maintenance of the cemetery.^{61.5}

Under a statute providing that "lands appropriated and set apart as burial grounds, either for public or private use . . . shall not be subject to sale on execution on any judgment to be hereafter recovered," cemetery lands appropriated and set apart for that purpose are absolutely exempt, and the owner of lots therein is entitled to exemption in them notwithstanding he derives an income from their sale.⁶²

Exemption after death. The lot owner's interest continues to be exempt from his debts after his death.⁶³

Exemption of specific cemetery property. Where the statute exempts specific property of cemetery associations from execution, other property owned by such an association is not exempt.⁶⁴

§ 34. Fodder or Food for Exempt Animals

Under statutes exempting crops for fodder for animals, only such crops as are suitable for fodder or were planted for that purpose are exempt. Under most authorities, the fodder exemption is conditional on the debtor's ownership of the animals for which fodder is exempted.

In order to exempt food for live stock there must be an express provision in the statute;⁶⁵ food for stock is not exempt merely because the stock is exempted.⁶⁶ Under a statute exempting certain crops for fodder for animals, only those crops which are suitable for the purpose are exempt,⁶⁷ and it is not sufficient to show that the crops may have been fed to animals under certain circumstances, but it must be shown that they are such as are ordinarily used for that purpose,⁶⁸ or that they were planted for fodder purposes and not for sale;⁶⁹ but under a statute exempting all "forage on hand for home consumption" it is not necessary that a particular kind of forage be indispensable, if it is suitable for feeding stock.⁷⁰ Crops which are not suitable cannot be made exempt on the ground that they can be sold and suitable crops purchased with the proceeds;⁷¹ but the fact that the farmer intends to sell the crops and purchase similar crops for fodder at the place to which he is moving does not bar the exemption claim.⁷²

Statutes in a few states have been construed to give an exemption absolute in terms, and not dependent on the debtor's owning all the animals for which fodder is exempted;⁷³ but according to the weight of authority the fodder exemption is conditional on the debtor's ownership of the exempt animals.⁷⁴ The right of a debtor to hold fodder as exempt under a statute exempting "all provisions and forage on hand for home consumption" is not defeated by the fact that he owns more animals than are exempt.⁷⁵

Whether fodder is exempt as necessary may depend on the season of the year in which the levy is made,⁷⁶ but where the statute exempts sufficient fodder for a specified period, a debtor who does not need the food for his animals at the time of the levy cannot claim it at any subsequent time, even though it remains unsold.⁷⁷

Lands of cemetery company which are part of tract laid out for burial purposes cannot be sold to satisfy judgment, even if they are not presently used for such purposes. N.J.—Gottlieb v. West Ridgelawn Cemetery, 158 A. 422, 109 N.J.Eq. 585.

§ 35. Food and Provisions for Debtor and Family

Under statutes exempting food and provisions for the debtor and his family, only provisions necessary for the sustenance of those persons are exempt; provisions held for sale or as part of the debtor's stock in trade are not exempt. By the weight of authority, the term "provisions" includes crops not yet severed from the soil.

To come within a statutory provision exempting "all provisions . . . on hand for home consumption," articles must be shown to fulfill these requirements.^{77, 50} Under statutes making specific provision for the exemption of food, provisions, and supplies for the sustenance of the debtor and his family, while it has been held that the term "provisions" can include only articles which are in a condition to be consumed as food or to be cooked as food,⁷⁸ this definition has been criticized as too restrictive.⁷⁹

Articles exempt. Under a statute exempting in broad terms "provisions" as such, corn is exempt,⁸⁰ but tobacco is not.⁸¹ Whether unthreshed wheat or oats are "provisions" has been held a question of fact for the jury.⁸² Under a statute which exempts "all necessary meat, fish, flour and vegetables actually provided for family use," Indian corn meal⁸³ and wheat⁸⁴ are not exempt as "flour." Under a statute exempting a debtor's "corn and grain, necessary and sufficient for the sustenance of himself and his family," oats, not being intended for human food, are not exempt,⁸⁵ nor is a barrel of flour purchased by the debtor and manufactured from grain of which he was never the owner.⁸⁶

Necessity. Where the statute exempts provisions "necessary" for the sustenance of the debtor and his family, necessary provisions include only such as are necessary for the debtor and the family,⁸⁷ and do not include provisions required for servants or farm hands,⁸⁸ or food prepared by a restaurant keeper for his boarders and customers.⁸⁹ Provisions required for a family would not be "necessary provisions" for an unmarried man.⁹⁰

Property for sale or exchange generally. It is held that the articles claimed exempt as provisions must be such as directly contribute to the sustenance of the debtor or his family, and that it is not sufficient that the articles may by sale and exchange indirectly contribute to the support of the family;⁹¹ but if the provisions are actually necessary for the support of the debtor's family the debtor's exemption will not be defeated by an intention on the part of the debtor to sell them or exchange them for other articles of prime necessity in his family, or even to obtain the means to pay his taxes; and this is so even though the debtor's intention is in process of being carried out.⁹²

Stock in trade. Articles which are in their nature provisions, but which are kept as part of a store of merchandise, and not for the use of the family, are not exempt as provisions,⁹³ even though the statute does not expressly require that the "provisions" shall have been provided for family use;⁹⁴ nor will the fact that the provisions are procured and kept both for the purpose of sale and for the use of the debtor's family avail the debtor where there has been no setting apart of the portion designed for family use,⁹⁵ and, in the absence of actual separation, it matters not that the debtor was in the habit of carrying home small quantities from the store as needed.⁹⁶

Crops. By the weight of authority, the term "provisions" includes crops not yet severed from the soil,⁹⁷ although it has been held, under a statute exempting "provisions actually prepared and designed for the use of the family," that a field of standing corn is not "provisions actually prepared and designed" for family use, and therefore not exempt under the statute.⁹⁸ Creditors may be prohibited by statute from levying on crops before a fixed date of the year in which they are grown, a date late enough to ensure their full growth.⁹⁹

A statute specifically exempting crops from execution has been held to mean only those crops which are suitable for breadstuffs.¹ A statute exempting crops necessary to the farm to which they are attached exempts the crops only as long as they are attached; there is no right to exemption in severed crops under such statutes, even though they are grown, not as money crops, but for family consumption.²

A statute which prohibits the seizure on execution of articles named "separately from the land to which they are attached" is not, properly speaking, an exemption statute, but a statute regulating seizure on execution, and the crops, under such statute, are not, as such, exempt.³

§ 36. — Food Animals

Under the varying language of particular statutes, food animals belonging to the debtor have, in a number of cases, been held to be exempt.

Under statutes so providing, food animals belonging to the debtor and necessary for the support of him and his family are exempt.⁴ Where the statute exempts specific animals, their use, or the necessity thereof, for the support of the debtor's family need not appear.⁵ Food animals have been held to be included under statutes exempting all provisions on hand "or growing for home consumption,"⁶ but not under a statute exempting "provisions" without qualification.⁷ A statute exempting sufficient provisions for a family for one year, any deficiency to be made up by setting apart to the debtor "so much of the live stock suitable for the purpose, and of the growing crop, if any, as may be necessary to supply it," is construed to apply only to live stock that can be used for food purposes.⁸

Statutes exempting a cow for the use of a debtor have been held to include a heifer,⁹ either where the debtor has no other animal of the kind¹⁰ or where the owner intends to keep the heifer as a milch cow.¹¹ A yearling heifer, however, is not a "calf" within the meaning of a statute exempting a certain number of cows "and a calf," a calf being defined as still being fed by its mother.¹²

A statute which exempts "one swine" to the debtor includes a hog that has been killed.¹³ A statute exempting one hog and the pork of the hog when slaughtered does not exempt a hog in addition to the pork of the slaughtered hog;¹⁴ but a statute exempting a debtor's "best swine or meat of a swine" is construed to exempt one live animal in any event, and the fact that a bankrupt has part of the meat of a swine does not deprive him of the right to select his best remaining swine as exempt.¹⁵ A statute which exempts pork "on foot" includes hogs of all sizes and conditions and at all seasons of the year which may, in due season and at the convenience of the debtor, be prepared for and converted into pork regardless of the question whether or not, at the time of the levy, they are in fit condition for slaughter.¹⁶

§ 37. Household Goods and Furniture

Under statutes generally prevailing, household goods and furniture are exempt, if necessary for, and used by, the debtor and his family; they are not exempt if used commercially, as for a boarding house or restaurant or for the debtor's shop or office.

Under statutes generally prevailing, household goods or furniture, or specific articles thereof, or a limited amount in value thereof, is exempt.¹⁷ A statute exempting household goods should be liberally construed in the householder's favor;^{17.5} and a reasonable and liberal view should be taken as to the degree of necessity contemplated by the statute.^{17.10}

The term "household furniture," it has been said, applies only to those vessels, utensils, or goods which are designed for use in the family as instruments of the household, and for conducting and managing household affairs.¹⁸ Where the statute exempts certain specific articles of household goods and "other household goods, utensils and furniture" not exceeding a certain amount in value, the debtor cannot have additional property of the same class as that specifically named.¹⁹

Necessity and usefulness. The exemption is ordinarily expressly limited to necessary articles,²⁰ the implication being one of necessity for the support of the debtor's family.²¹ The household furniture, to be regarded as necessary for the debtor and his family, need not be absolutely indispensable to the bare existence of life, but may include what may be considered as necessary to comfort and convenience,²² although there is some contrary authority, to the effect that actual necessity must exist.²³ Superfluities, however, and articles of luxury, fancy, and ornament are excluded.²⁴

In determining what articles of household furniture are necessary, regard may be had to the improved standard in living, the improvement in the arts, and the general tendency to increase the amount of the debtor's exemption;²⁵ but the meaning ought not to be enlarged by a change in the station in life or previous habits of the individual, as is allowable in determining what are necessities for a wife and a minor.²⁶ The necessity is to be determined as of the time when the property is levied on and claimed as exempt, and not as of the time when the statute was enacted.²⁷ No question of necessity is involved under a statute which exempts certain specific household furniture, together with all other household furniture not specially enumerated.²⁸

Use by household or family. To be exempt, the furniture may be required to be kept and used by the debtor and his family;²⁹ furniture devoted to commercial uses does not fall within the exemption statute,³⁰ and the term "household furniture" does not include the furniture of the debtor's shop or office.³¹ Property may be exempt as household furniture even though the debtor is unmarried³² and has no children.³³ Furniture in an apartment sublet by the debtor is not exempt as household furniture.³⁴

In order that furniture may be exempt, it need not necessarily be in actual use at the time when it is levied on;³⁵ it is exempt, although in storage, if it is stored during a mere temporary absence and there is an intention to return and use it again.³⁶

boarding house or restaurant is not exempt from execution,³⁷ except so much of it as is used by him for the use of his family;³⁸ but where used in the latter manner it is immaterial that it was originally purchased for use in a boarding house.³⁹ Under statutes not involving any question of necessity of the furniture for the family support, as where the statute exempts "all other household furniture" in addition to certain enumerated articles, the question of use by the debtor for his family becomes immaterial, so that under such statutes household furniture kept by the debtor for the use of boarders and guests is exempt⁴⁰ if within the statutory limitation of amount.⁴¹

On the other hand, under statutes exempting "all household and kitchen furniture," without limitation as to value, and without expressly requiring that it be necessary for the use of the debtor and his family, it has been held that household and kitchen furniture used in hotels and restaurants, beyond that which is used by the family, is not exempt,⁴² while furniture used by a person who lives in a private house and takes boarders incidentally for the purpose of support is exempt.⁴³

Particular articles. Beds are exempt as "household furniture,"⁴⁴ the number depending on the size of the debtor's family,⁴⁵ not including boarders, where the furniture exempted is restricted to that used by the debtor's family.⁴⁶ Bedding has also been exempted.⁴⁷ A cooking stove is exempt as an article of household furniture necessary for upholding life.⁴⁸ A "family library," exempt as such under the express terms of a statute, includes all books used by the family,⁴⁹ and a surgeon who has a family may claim to have included in his "family library," as exempt, medical books used by him.⁵⁰ A silver card receiver used on hatrack is household furniture.⁵¹ A traveling trunk, a cabinet box, and a breastpin are not household furniture.⁵² A rifle is not exempt as an article of household and kitchen furniture, although it might be as the furniture of a frontiersman's tent or cabin.⁵³ A television set is not within an exemption of "household furniture."^{53.5} An automobile which is not in use and is stored in a driveway is not within the description of "family stores of a housekeeper," as set out in an exemption statute.^{53.10}

Pianos are generally not considered articles of household furniture, within the meaning of the term as used in the exemption laws,⁵⁴ especially where the statute in terms exempts household furniture "necessary for upholding life."⁵⁵ There is authority, however, for the contrary view under statutes exempting household furniture "necessary for the use and comfort of the family;"⁵⁶ and where the statute does not in terms require household furniture to be necessary in order to be exempt, but exempts "all household and kitchen furniture," the question is one of the character of the use; if the piano is used as household furniture it is exempt,⁵⁷ but if such use has been abandoned, and the piano has been placed on sale in a salesroom, it is not.⁵⁸

Even where only necessary furniture is exempt, there is authority for holding a piano exempt, where there is a statutory limit to the amount of the exemption and all the furniture claimed, including the piano, is within the limit,⁵⁹ as well as where no limit is fixed to the amount of household furniture exempt.⁶⁰ Where the statute exempts household furniture "necessary for the debtor's personal use," it is held that whether the piano is exempt or not is a question of fact for the jury to determine, depending on the condition and circumstances of the family.⁶¹

Clocks and watches. Whether a clock is exempt as necessary household furniture is a question of fact for the jury,⁶³ although it has been held that if the clock is the only one in the debtor's house it is, as a matter of law, exempt.⁶⁴ However, an expensive clock has been held not exempt, even though it may be the only one the debtor has.⁶⁵ A watch and chain habitually carried on the person of the debtor for his own convenience, and not used for the benefit of the family, is not exempt as "household furniture."⁶⁶ A watch not worn on the person, but kept in the house in the place of a clock, would be exempt.⁶⁷

§ 38. Library or Instruments of Professional Men

Under statutes so providing, the library, instruments, or working tools of a professional man are exempt; this principle has been applied to the books or instruments of clergymen, lawyers, physicians, dentists, and others.

Under statutes so providing, the library and instruments or working tools of a professional man are exempt in a number of jurisdictions.⁶⁸ A debtor not belonging to the class known as professional men is not entitled under such statutes to an exemption in the tools of his occupation.⁶⁹ Where a limit of value is fixed by statute, only books and instruments within the statutory limit are exempt.⁷⁰ Habitual use of the books and instruments by the debtor in the practice of his profession is not necessary, in the absence of statutory requirement to that effect.⁷¹ It is not necessary that the profession in which the instrument is used be the debtor's sole occupation.⁷²

An abstracter of titles has been held entitled to hold as exempt one set of abstracts, a safe to keep them in, a cabinet, and a table.⁷³

By the enactment of a statute providing that all books, maps, plats, and other papers kept or used by any person for the purpose of making abstracts of title to land constitute property which is exempt from execution, a legislature fully intends to provide that an abstracter be not stripped of his tools and deprived of his effective means of livelihood.^{73.5}

Clergymen. The books used by a minister of the gospel for the purpose of his calling are not liable to seizure.⁷⁴

Dentists. Dental instruments have been held exempt either as "mechanical tools"⁷⁵ or as "instruments necessary for the exercise" of the dentist's profession,⁷⁶ although it has also been held that a dentist is not entitled to exemptions under a statute for the benefit of mechanics.⁷⁷ A dentist is entitled only to the instruments which are appropriate to the practice of dentistry,⁷⁸ and his piano and guitar are not exempt as tools of his profession.⁷⁹ It has been held that a dentist's chair is not exempt as a common tool of trade.⁸⁰

Lawyers; judges. A lawyer's library is exempt under statutes exempting the library and instruments of professional men;⁸¹ but has been held not exempt under statutes exempting the "common tools" or "working tools" of a debtor,⁸² although there is authority opposed.⁸³ A share in a law library association has been held exempt.⁸⁴ A lawyer's ordinary office furniture, including his table, desk, bookcases, letter press, safe, etc., necessary to enable him to carry on his business, is included in the term "instruments"⁸⁵ or "all tools, apparatus, and books belonging to any trade or profession."⁸⁶

An automobile used by a judge is not exempt as an instrument or tool necessary for the exercise of his profession.⁸⁷

Musician or teacher of music. Under a statute exempting generally the tools and instruments used by a debtor in his trade or calling, a cornet,⁸⁸ violin and bow,⁸⁹ and a piano⁹⁰ have been held exempt, where it appeared that the debtor depended on the instrument for support.

An optometrist is not within the scope of a statute exempting the instruments and office furniture of a physician or surgeon.⁹¹

Physician or surgeon. "Family library," in the exemption laws, has been held to embrace the professional library of a surgeon who is the head of a family,⁹² and his surgical instruments have been held to be exempt as his "tools,"⁹³ as have his safe to keep them in,⁹⁴ and a buggy and harness to aid him in making his visits,⁹⁵ although there is authority for refusing to exempt a doctor's horse.⁹⁶ A stock of drugs in a physician's office, not kept for sale, but dispensed in connection with his services, has been held to be within an exemption of tools and instruments.^{96.5}

On the other hand, a physician's typewriter has been held not to be exempt as a "tool."⁹⁷ The equipment and apparatus of a private hospital owned by a practicing physician are not exempt as the "library and implements of a professional man."⁹⁸

§ 39. Life Insurance

- a. In general
- b. Particular types of policies
- c. Validity

- e. Pecuniary benefits available before maturity

a. In General

Statutes granting an exemption to the proceeds of life insurance are to be liberally construed. The fact that premiums were paid during insolvency, or with funds obtained by fraud, does not, according to some authorities, affect the exemption rights of the beneficiary, but other authorities hold differently.

Under statutes providing to that effect, the proceeds of life insurance are exempt from the claims of creditors,⁹⁹ whether the contract was made with tive grant,⁶ and grounds for the exemption of the proceeds of insurance policies must be found in the statutes.⁷

The proceeds of policies issued before the enactment of the statute may be subject to its provisions,⁸ although it has been held that the statute may not be invoked to defeat the rights of a judgment creditor where the judgment was entered prior to the enactment of the statute.^{8.5}

Statutes exempting money received from life insurance sometimes require that the policy or certificate of insurance be issued by a company or association incorporated within the state,⁹ but this is not a universal rule.¹⁰ The exemption provided for may be confined to policies taken out by a wife for her benefit on the life of her husband;¹¹ but it has been held that statutes exempting a policy which a wife has caused to be taken out on the life of her husband are applicable to insurance taken out by a husband for the benefit of his wife, since in such case he is presumed to have acted for her.¹²

used by insured to pay premiums were obtained by him by fraud, the proceeds of the policy are not exempt from the claims of those defrauded;¹³ further, by express provision of some statutes, insurance premiums paid in fraud of creditors, may be recovered from the proceeds of the policy for the benefit of insured's estate.¹⁴ According to other authorities, however, even where the money to pay the premiums was secured by the debtor through fraud, the widow's exemption in the proceeds of the policy will not be affected thereby, if she herself was not a party to the fraud.¹⁵

The mere fact that premiums were paid while insured was insolvent does not usually affect the exemption rights of the beneficiary,¹⁶ although, under some statutes, creditors may recover from the proceeds the amount of premiums paid by the insured in fraud of their rights,^{16.5} as, for example, where premiums were paid during insolvency in a given period in excess of an amount stated.¹⁷ It has been held that where insured, while insolvent, changes a policy originally payable to his estate by designating a different beneficiary, making the transaction tantamount to a gift without consideration to the new beneficiary, creditors of insured are, where insured had knowledge that he was about to die when he made the transfer, entitled to subject the proceeds¹⁸ and that the fraudulent transferee is not entitled to any part thereof.¹⁹

b. Particular Types of Policies

The exemption afforded the proceeds of life insurance policies applies, with certain limitations and exceptions, to endowment policies, federal war risk insurance, fraternal and mutual benefit insurance, group insurance, and annuity policies.

Whether a particular life insurance policy is of a type falling within the exemption statutes, or is excluded from the operation of the statutes by the nature of its provisions, depends on the terms of the governing statutes.²⁰

Endowment policy. In some jurisdictions, exemption of the proceeds of an endowment policy, payable in certain contingencies to insured himself, is not allowed.²¹ In others, the fact that an insurance policy contains endowment features does not abrogate an exemption which would otherwise exist,²² and even where a statute exempts only the proceeds of policies payable to a person other than insured, as for example, his wife or children, the fact that under certain contingencies insured might have received the benefits of an endowment policy will not preclude the right of such other person to the exemption, where the contingencies under which insured might have benefited have never occurred;²³ but, where the contingency under which insured is to benefit has occurred, the proceeds of the endowment policy, set apart and payable to insured, are subject to the payment of insured's debts.²⁴ Where a statute exempts all life insurance regardless of who the beneficiary may be, an endowment policy by which a company agrees to pay insured a sum of money after a certain period has been held to be life insurance within the statutory exemption.²⁵

It has been held that the proceeds of an endowment policy paid at the expiration of the endowment period, even though paid in accordance with its terms, to the wife of insured is not exempt from the claims of insured's creditors where the premiums were paid by insured while insolvent, the transaction being considered as in the nature of a loan and the insurance a mere incident.²⁶

Federal war risk insurance. By federal statute the proceeds of war risk insurance policies are granted certain exemptions from the claims of creditors,^{26.5} and are not subject to attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal or equitable process, either before or after receipt by the beneficiary;^{26.10} and this statute is to be liberally construed.²⁷ The proceeds are exempt from the claims of creditors of any named beneficiary bearing a designated relationship to insured.²⁸ Under the federal statute proceeds payable to the estate of the insured for distribution to his heirs are exempt from the claims of creditors of such heirs,^{28.5} but prior to the terest in the policy, even though the policy is an endowment policy payable to her husband at the expiration of a certain number of years and she is entitled to the proceeds only in the event of his death prior thereto.

amending of the statute they were not.²⁹ Where the entire amount due under the policy has been paid to a proper beneficiary, who thereafter dies, the amount distributed to the heirs at law of such beneficiary, by virtue of their heirship, is not exempt from the claims of creditors of such heirs.³⁰

The federal war risk insurance statutes as originally enacted afforded no exemption from the claims of insured's creditors where the proceeds became payable to his estate, as, for example, on the death of the named beneficiary.³¹ The same result has been reached notwithstanding an amendment extending the exemption benefit to payments made to, or on account of, any beneficiary of the policy;³² but there is authority holding that such amendment has rendered the proceeds of the policy exempt from the claims of insured's creditors, even though such proceeds are payable to his estate.³³

The proceeds of war risk insurance may be exempt under state statute,³⁴ and have been held so exempt under a statute exempting from seizure a pension or other reward granted by the United States for military service.³⁵

Fraternal and mutual benefit insurance is specifically exempted under some statutes,³⁶ in which case insurer must fall within the definition, if any, contained in the statute.³⁷ A fund created by a mutual benefit insurance association is exempt as life insurance within the meaning of statutes exempting life insurance generally.³⁸

Group insurance policies, or the proceeds thereof, have been held exempt.³⁹

tion granted does not violate constitutional provisions respecting the amount thereof, as considered infra § 40. On the other hand, a statute exempting the proceeds of an existing policy is invalid as to antecedent contractual debts under the contract clause of the federal Constitution,⁴⁸ particularly where the exemption granted is without limitation as to time, amount, circumstances, or need.⁴⁹

A constitutional provision exempting specific property does not invalidate a statute providing for the exemption of life insurance where such constitutional provision is not exclusive or intended to limit the legislative power with respect to life insurance.⁵⁰

Cash surrender value. Where the legislature has power to exempt the proceeds of life insurance, it also has the power to exempt the cash surrender value thereof.⁵¹

d. Beneficiaries

- (1) In general
- (2) Policy payable to insured or his legal representatives
- (3) Option to change beneficiaries

(1) In General

The benefits of a statute exempting insurance proceeds extend, in general, only to the persons whom the statute was designed to protect, and to policies the proceeds of which are payable to such persons.

Statutes limiting the exemption of the proceeds of life insurance policies to a designated class of beneficiaries must be construed according to their intention with regard to the person entitled to take as beneficiary.⁵² The term "heirs" or "heirs at law" as used in a statute exempting the proceeds of a policy payable to such persons means those who bear such relationship to insured at the time of his death.⁵³

It is not necessary, under statutes exempting policies taken for the benefit of a wife or children, that the policy be payable by its terms to such beneficiaries;⁵⁴ it is sufficient that the policy inures to the benefit of the wife by operation of law,⁵⁵ and a policy payable to a trustee for the benefit of the wife or children will be protected.⁵⁶

An annuity contract providing for payments to an individual on his attaining a certain age, and also providing for the payment of a death benefit to his wife in the event of his death before reaching such age, is an annuity contract for the benefit of a wife within the meaning of a statute exempt-

Purpose of statute

The purpose of the statute relating to beneficiaries of life policies who are married women is to assure that provision which a man by his life insurance has made for support of his wife and children after his death shall receive substantial protection against claims of his creditors.

Benefit of statutory provisions exempting life insurance held not limited to insured's widow and children. Cal.—Prudential Ins. Co. of America v. Beck, 103 P.2d 241, 39 C.A.2d 355.

Creditor's right to question dependency

A creditor who seeks by garnish-

ment to reduce the money due to the beneficiary in a certificate of life insurance duly issued by a fraternal insurance association as defined by statute cannot raise the question of the dependence of the beneficiary on insured in order to relieve the fund from the operation of the law rendering it not liable for the debts of the beneficiary.

Second husband of widow

Where statutes limit the exemption of insurance proceeds to insured's spouse and family, and the beneficiary, insured's widow, remarries and dies after receiving the proceeds, no exemption exists in such proceeds in favor of her second husband.

ing such contracts from the claims of the husband's creditors.⁵⁷

Default of required class of beneficiaries. Exemption statutes designed for the protection of designated relatives of insured, such as his widow and children, have been construed not to create an exemption in favor of the estate of the debtor in case he dies without leaving such relatives;⁵⁸ but under the express terms of some statutes,⁵⁹ and by implication from the language of others,⁶⁰ in the absence of widow or children the proceeds of an insurance policy go to heirs and legatees, exempt from payment of decedent's debts.

It has been held under a statute providing for an exemption in favor of a widow that, where there is no provision as to a beneficiary in case she should not survive to take, the proceeds belong to her children if she has any surviving her, with the same freedom from interference on the part of creditors as in the case of the first beneficiary.⁶¹ A policy originally exempt because payable to a wife loses its exemption on the termination of the marriage by divorce.⁶²

Testamentary disposition. Under statutes exempting the proceeds of life insurance for the benefit of the debtor's widow and children and allowing him to dispose of the insurance money by will, he can, although the estate is insolvent, apportion the insurance money by will between his wife and children as he sees fit,⁶³ but, if he is insolvent, he cannot bestow it by will on other persons.⁶⁴

(2) Policy Payable to Insured or His Legal Representatives

In the absence of express statutory provision to the contrary, policies payable to the insured or his legal representatives are not usually exempt from the claims of the insured's creditors.

Under some statutes a policy payable to insured or to his legal representatives is not exempt from claims of creditors of the estate,⁶⁵ and this is also the general rule where the life insurance exemption statute contains no express provision extending its operation to such policies.⁶⁶ Under other statutes such a policy is exempt from the claims of insured's creditors,⁶⁷ the benefit of such an exemption being sometimes confined to the surviving spouse and children.⁶⁸ A policy payable to insured's estate is exempt under a statute exempting the proceeds or avails of all life insurance.⁶⁹

nership, even though the partnership has dissolved and insured has become its successor.⁷⁰

(3) Option to Change Beneficiaries

The exemption granted as to a life insurance policy is usually not lost by the fact that the insured has the right to change the beneficiary.

Under statutes protecting the wife and children of insured, the exemption right, by the weight of authority, is not affected by the fact that an option is reserved to insured to change the beneficiary,⁷¹ where the option is not exercised;⁷² but under statutes less liberal in their terms a different result has been reached.⁷³

e. Pecuniary Benefits Available before Maturity

(1) Dividends

(2) Surrender and loan values

(1) Dividends

The exemption of an insurance policy extends to dividends thereon if not appropriated to the use of the insured; but dividends left with the company to accumulate, and withdrawals at his option, have been held not exempt.

A statute exempting the proceeds and avails of a life insurance policy will exempt dividends due on the policy^{73,50} as long as they have not been appropriated to the use of the debtor,⁷⁴ and thus will exempt dividends which insured has elected to have applied toward the payment of premiums.⁷⁵ It has been held, however, that dividends left with the company to accumulate at interest, but withdrawable by insured at his option, are not exempt.⁷⁶

(2) Surrender and Loan Values

It is the general rule that the cash surrender or loan value may not be appropriated by creditors; but where the proceeds of a policy are not exempt, its cash surrender value is not.

Except as the governing statute may indicate an intention to the contrary,⁷⁷ the general rule is that where the proceeds of a life insurance policy are exempt, sums which could be, but have not been, realized thereon before maturity by virtue of its loan⁷⁸ or surrender⁷⁹ value are also exempt from the demands of creditors, and cannot be appropriated by them; but the exemption does not apply to moneys actually received by insured by the exercise

If the proceeds of a policy are not exempt, the cash surrender value is not.⁸²

§ 40. — Amount Exempted

The exemption granted to the proceeds of life insurance may be limited by constitutional or statutory provisions, either with respect to the face amount of the policy or as to the amount of the premiums; and no exemption exists as to an amount exceeding the designated limitation.

The amount of insurance which may be exempt is limited under some statutes,⁸³ although not under others.⁸⁴ A restriction of this nature has been held operative even though insured was solvent when the premiums were paid;⁸⁵ but it has also been held that the limitation on the amount of exempt proceeds is applicable only with respect to premiums paid while insured was financially embarrassed.⁸⁶

Under some statutes the restriction is placed on the amount of premiums, and only such proceeds are exempt as to which the annual premium does not exceed a designated amount.⁸⁷ The amount must be reckoned from premiums paid on all the policies held by insured,⁸⁸ except where the statute clearly has reference to the premium paid on each policy.⁸⁹ Where the premiums paid exceed the amount permitted, the creditors may recover depending on the terms of the governing statute, the excess premiums, with interest,⁹⁰ the insurance purchased by the excess premiums,⁹¹ or even the entire proceeds of the policy.⁹² The fact that the

(2) However, subsequent statutory provisions have changed this result, "so as to provide for exemption of such portion of the proceeds from life insurance, when the total annual premiums paid exceed $500, as said sum of $500 bears to the total premiums paid."

Cal.—California U. S. Bond & Mort-

policy was procured outside the state has been held not to affect the rights of creditors to recover that part of the proceeds paid for by the insured, while a resident within the state, with premiums in excess of the statutory amount.^{92.5} Under some statutes, it has been held that an amount in excess of a designated amount may be expended for insurance provided such expenditure is done in good faith and without intent to cheat, hinder, or delay creditors.^{92.10}

The exemption may be restricted by statute to proceeds in a designated amount, without regard to the amount of the premiums.⁹³ A statute which exempts the "proceeds" of a policy up to a designated amount has been held to exempt any policy the cash surrender value of which is, at the time, less than the designated amount, notwithstanding the face amount of the policy is in excess thereof.⁹⁴ In the case of a beneficiary who has received more than the exemption allowed, but who has spent part of the proceeds, leaving a balance in an amount less than the exemption, there is authority holding that such balance cannot be reached by creditors;⁹⁵ but other authority holds that such balance can be reached to the extent to which the sum originally received exceeded the allowable exemption.⁹⁶

In determining whether claims against insured's estate should be paid in part from the proceeds of exempt insurance, rather than exclusively from funds on hand in excess thereof, the statutes are construed, where possible, to allow the full exemption to those entitled thereto.⁹⁷

Validity. The validity of life insurance exemption statutes generally is considered supra § 39. There is authority holding that a provision for an unlimited exemption is invalid under constitutional provisions providing for the exemption of a reasonable amount of personal property,⁹⁸ although the contrary has also been held.⁹⁹ A constitutional provision that property exempt from execution shall not exceed in value a specified amount does not invalidate a statute exempting from attachment money or other benefits payable under a certificate issued by a fraternal association, even though the exemption from attachment exceeds in amount the exemption from execution allowed in the constitution.¹ In the absence of constitutional restrictions, the legislature need not limit the amount of insurance which shall be exempt.²

The federal war risk insurance statute cannot be attacked as invalid on the ground that it enlarges the exemptions of an individual beyond the amount fixed by the provisions of a state constitution.³

§ 41. — Duration of Exemption

Differences in the language of the governing statutes have resulted in a difference in view as to whether insurance proceeds continue to be exempt after their receipt by the beneficiary; and a difference also exists as to the exemption of property purchased with such proceeds.

Attorneys' fees

Where an administrator sues for and obtains insurance moneys in excess of the amount exempted by statute, and the attorneys' fees incurred in collecting the funds are not more than such excess, such fees should be paid out of the excess, and the full exemption allowed to the beneficiaries, and it is improper to apportion such fees between the amount of the exemption and the excess recovered.

Under statutes exempting the funds in the hands of the insurer from seizure on legal process for the satisfaction of the debts of insured or the beneficiary, it is held that the exemption continues only while the funds are in the hands of the insurer,⁴ and that they may be reached where they have been paid to the agent of the beneficiary,⁵ or to the beneficiary,⁶ or to the personal representatives of insured,⁷ or have been deposited by the beneficiary to his own credit⁸ at interest.^{8.5} It has also been held that the exemption does not obtain after the policy has matured,^{8.10} as, for example, by the death of the insured,⁹ or payment has become fixed in accordance with the terms of the policy.^{9.5} Under other statutes the proceeds of a policy are exempt in the hand of the beneficiary,¹⁰ and under such a statute the proceeds of an insurance policy do not lose their exemption by being deposited in a bank by the beneficiary¹¹ in a noninterest account,^{11.5} or by being deposited in an attorney's trust account pursuant to a court order.^{11.10}

A statute providing that insurance becoming due and payable under the terms of the policy shall be exempt from the claims of all creditors of the insured or beneficiary has been held to exempt proceeds collected by the administrator of insured.¹² Under a statute exempting the proceeds of an insurance policy payable to a widow, it has been held that on her death such proceeds become subject to the claims of her creditors on debts contracted by her before her husband's death.¹³

Property purchased with proceeds. Under statutes broadly exempting the proceeds of life insurance, the exemption has been held to extend to property purchased therewith;¹⁴ but under other statutes, less liberal in their terms, a conclusion to the contrary has been reached.¹⁵ In construing life insurance exemption statutes to determine whether property purchased with the proceeds is exempt, analogous statutes dealing with other exempt property should be considered, but are not controlling.¹⁶

§ 42. — Debts Affected

The governing statutes determine whether life insurance proceeds are exempt as against particular debts, such as those founded on claims against the beneficiary, advances on the policy, and funeral expenses; and they may authorize a special contract between the insured and his creditors making debts enforceable against such proceeds, although they would not otherwise be so enforceable.

Whether a claim or debt is affected by, or excepted from, the operation of the statutes exempting the proceeds of life insurance depends on the terms of the governing statutes.¹⁷ Generally the beneficiary or recipient of insurance moneys has no exemption therein as against the claims of his or her own creditors;¹⁸ but the terms of some statutes have been held broad enough to include such an exemption.¹⁹ In the case of a policy payable to a widow or made for her benefit, it has been held that the proceeds are exempt as against her creditors²⁰ or those of any other person.²¹ Under some statutes a wife, in order to be entitled to the proceeds of a policy as against her own creditors, must be the procuring cause of the insurance,^{21.5} while under others, however, it has been held that any person may be the procuring cause.^{21.10}

Notwithstanding a statute exempting the proceeds of a life insurance policy from seizure for any debt of the policyholder or beneficiary, the proceeds may be made subject to the payment of the debts of insured's estate where the surrounding circumstances evidence that such was the intention of insured,²² as where the policy is made payable to his executor or administrator.²³

Time when debt arose. Some statutes exempting life insurance exclude from their operation creditors whose claims arose out of, or were based on, obligations created before the statutes took effect.²⁴ A statute exempting in broad terms the proceeds of all life and accident insurance policies from all liability for any debt has been construed to refer only to such debts as are in existence at the death of insured, when the interest of the beneficiary becomes vested, and not to those incurred thereafter;²⁵ but a result to the contrary has also

What constitutes existing claim

(1) An insurance exemption statute excluding existing claims from its operation has been construed as referring to claims to which the policy, except for the statute, would be subject; there can be no such claim as to a policy not yet in existence, and hence all creditors are barred as to such a policy, regardless of when their claims arose.

U.S.—In re Beach, D.C.Mass., 8 F. Supp. 910.

(2) Under such a statute, insurance proceeds are exempt as against a claim on a note given after the statute, in extinction of a debt which arose prior thereto.

been reached under a similar statute.²⁶ Under a statute providing that insurance money paid to the surviving widow shall be exempt as to debts of the insured contracted before his death, insurance money paid to the widow will be exempt as to a promissory note signed by the husband, even though she also signs it after his death.²⁷

Advances on policy. Where the policy provides for the payment to the beneficiary of the amount of the policy after deducting amounts owing to the insurance company for advances by it to the insured, the exemption attaches only to the balance of the proceeds after deductions by the insurance company, and cannot be claimed against debts owed by insured to the company.²⁸ An exemption statute excluding from its operation advance payments made on or against the policy has been held to mean advances made to insured or beneficiary by insurer under the terms of the policy, and not those made by strangers.²⁹

Special contracts or arrangements. In order to recover under a statute providing that debts, otherwise not enforceable against the proceeds of an insurance policy, may be made so by a special contract or arrangement securing the debt, entered into between insured and his creditor, the creditor must show a special contract falling within the meaning of the statute;³⁰ further, there must be a meeting of the minds of insured and the creditor whose debt is to be secured by the policy,³¹ and the contract must be clear and explicit.³² The fact that insured expressed his desire that the avails of his policies should go in payment of his debts,³³ or that he promised the creditor to take out a policy of life insurance in the belief that, if he died before paying his creditor, the creditor would be paid from the avails of the insurance,³⁴ does not constitute a special contract or arrangement within the meaning of such a statute. Where the amount of the policy is in excess of the debt for the security of which it is claimed that the policy is taken out, there must be an assignment of a specific part of the avails of the life insurance policy as security for the debt.³⁵

The beneficiary cannot assert a right of exemption as against a creditor to whom insured has validly assigned the policy during his lifetime, at least where the exemption statutes operate only against general creditors of insured's estate.³⁶ A policy assigned to a third person by both insured and the beneficiary, to secure a debt, has been held not exempt from a claim of a creditor of such third person.³⁷

The funeral expenses of insured are not one of his debts within the meaning of a statute exempting the proceeds of life insurance from decedent's debts.³⁸

Debts arising out of a beneficiary's fraudulent conduct are barred under a life insurance exemption statute, the language of which is broad enough to bar all debts of whatever nature and in whatsoever manner incurred.³⁹ terminated by the terms of these statutes.⁴⁰ In the absence of statute, there is no public policy which exempts pension moneys from the claims of the pensioner's creditors.⁴¹ The exemption of pension moneys has been held not to extend to interest and accumulations on investments made therewith;⁴² but the exemption of the principal is not lost by commingling it with interest received thereon, where each item can be readily identified.⁴³

Bounty money has been protected on grounds of public policy from seizure for the debts of the person to whom the bounty is due, at least until it has been received in his hands,⁴⁴ or even absolutely.⁴⁵ If the statute protects bounty money from seizure only until it can be received in his hands, it is subject to execution for the recipient's debts after he⁴⁶ or his agent⁴⁷ has received it.

(2) Under Act of Congress

The federal statute exempting pension moneys before or during transmission to the pensioner does not protect such funds after their receipt. A fortiori, under most authorities, property purchased with such funds is not exempt.

The principles set forth in this subdivision have been enunciated mainly under U.S.Rev.St.1878 § 4747, 38 U.S.C.A. § 54, providing that "no sum of money due, or to become due, to any pensioner shall be liable to attachment, levy, or seizure by or under any legal or equitable process whatever, whether the same remains with the Pension Office, or any officer or agent thereof, or is in course of transmission to the pensioner entitled thereto, but shall inure wholly to the benefit of such pensioner;" and it should be borne in mind that this statute has been repealed and its place taken by statutes exempting moneys paid under laws relating to veterans, see infra this section subdivision b. Under the statute quoted, it is held by the weight of authority that pension money is exempt until it is actually paid to, and received by, the pensioner,⁴⁸ and does not cease to be exempt when he receives the draft.⁴⁹ It follows that a pensioner can give his pension drafts to his wife or to any other person, for the money is protected as long as it is in the form of a government draft, and his creditors in such a case cannot complain,⁵⁰ although there is authority holding that after the proceeds of the check have been realized and paid over to the wife, they are subject to the claims of creditors.⁵¹ While some decisions hold that pension money is exempt even after it has been actually paid to the pensioner,⁵² this construction of the act has been disapproved by the supreme court of the United States,⁵³ and by the state courts generally, most of which have held that the act of congress protects pension money only while it is in the pension office, or with an officer or agent thereof, or in course of transmission to the pensioner, and that after he has actually received the money the exemption ceases.⁵⁴

25 C.J. p 78 note 35.

In some jurisdictions it has been held that, although a pensioner has deposited his pension draft in a bank, and the proceeds have been placed to his credit as a deposit, subject to his check, the proceeds are not subject to attachment, as the money is not to be regarded as having come into his hands until received from the bank.⁵⁵ Most of the courts, however, hold that the pension money, when the proceeds thereof are in bank subject to check, is to be regarded as received by the pensioner, and is no longer exempt.⁵⁶ The proceeds of a pension draft are not exempt after they have been placed by the pensioner in the hands of a third person for safekeeping.⁵⁷

The phrase in the federal act, "shall inure wholly to the benefit of such pensioner," has been construed as giving the pensioner an exemption in the pension money so long as he retains personal possession of it, with the intention of using it for his own benefit or for the comfort of his family,⁵⁸ and a distinction has been made between use of the money for support of himself and his family and its investment in business, the money being exempt under the act in the former case, and not exempt in the latter.⁵⁹

Purchases with, or investments of, proceeds. From the view generally held that pension money paid to the pensioner and in his hands is not exempt, as above set forth, it follows that property purchased with exemption money is not exempt.⁶⁰ On the other hand, in a jurisdiction where pension money is considered exempt, notwithstanding its payment to the pensioner, there are decisions which hold exempt property in which pension money has been invested, so long as the property can be identified as its proceeds.⁶¹ Lands conveyed to the wife of the pensioner in consideration of pension money have been held exempt,⁶² even under an interpretation of the federal statute giving exemption only as long as the money is in course of transmission to the pensioner;⁶³ but other authority is to the contrary.⁶⁴

(3) Under State Statutes

Some statutes exempt pension moneys only until received by the pensioner; under other statutes such moneys are exempt after their receipt, or deposit in a bank, by the pensioner. There is a corresponding disagreement as to whether the exemption extends to property purchased with the money.

In various states statutory provisions permit the exemption of state,⁶⁵ federal,⁶⁶ or other⁶⁷ pensions; and under the view that the federal statute ceases to be operative after the pension money has been paid over, as discussed supra subdivision a (2) of this section, any right to an exemption in a pensioner must, after the money has been paid to him, be found in the state law.⁶⁸ In some states pension money is protected only up to the time it is received by the pensioner,⁶⁹ although exempt while in the possession of the agents of the government or in transit to the pensioner.⁷⁰ Under other statutory provisions pension money received from the United States government is exempt whether in the actual possession of the pensioner or deposited, lent, or invested by him,⁷¹ and under such a statute a public administrator is not entitled to possession of the pension money in order to subject it to the payment of his own fees and commissions.⁷² A state statute exempting "pension money" or a "pension" exempts the money after it has reached the pensioner.⁷³

Pension moneys do not, under some statutes, lose their exemption by being deposited in a bank,⁷⁴ subject to the check of the pensioner,⁷⁵ or in return for an interest-bearing certificate of deposit;⁷⁶ and a statute exempting pension moneys in the hands of the pensioner exempts the proceeds of a pension check on deposit in a savings bank.⁷⁷

Claim for support. Under some statutes pension money is exempt from the claim of a state or county for pensioner's support in a state or county institution,⁷⁸ nor can it be taken on the claim of state or county for the support of pensioner's insane son, even though a statute provides that a relative of sufficient ability can be compelled to maintain a poor person.⁷⁹

Property purchased with pension money is not exempt where the view is maintained that pension money is no longer exempt after it has reached the debtor's hands.⁸⁰ Under statutes in several jurisdictions, however, such property is exempt,⁸¹ except that the exemption cannot be enforced against debts contracted before the enactment of the statute⁸² or in favor of a pensioner who died before such enactment.⁸³ Property on which a mortgage lien has been discharged with pension money is "purchased property," and exempt as such⁸⁴ to the extent of the amount of pension money invested.⁸⁵ It has been held that property purchased with pension money is exempt even though the pension money was only a part of the money consideration, provided the balance of the purchase price has been paid out of proceeds from the sale of an interest in the land.⁸⁶

Where the pensioner invests in land or in animals, he is entitled generally, under statutes protecting such investments, only to the land and the animals which represent the actual investment,⁸⁷ and the exemption does not extend to crops grown on the land,⁸⁸ or to the increase from the animals,⁸⁹ unless the statute expressly so provides.⁹⁰

The protection of the statute has been given to other property for which the purchased property is exchanged;⁹⁵ but if it becomes impossible to identify the fund in the various articles of property in which, through numerous and successive changes, it has become invested, the pensioner loses his right of exemption.⁹⁶

Effect of pensioner's death. (1) In General

Benefits paid to war veterans and their beneficiaries are exempt under federal and some state statutes, from the claims of creditors, even after the receipt of such funds by the beneficiary. Property purchased with such moneys is not exempt under the federal statutes, but may be under a state statute.

Federal statutes exempt from the claims of creditors benefits payable under the laws relating to veterans,¹ where the payments or proceeds are identified and can be traced,^{1.5} and such exemption is not limited to the children, widows, and estates of veterans, but extends as well to the veterans themselves.² The exemption under the federal statute, however, is not extended to the protection of the heirs or next of kin of a deceased pensioner, as against the creditors of the pensioner, where the pension payments have terminated.^{2.5} of the federal government payable to their widows and children and not to their personal representatives, state courts have held that such bounty and back pay in the hands of the widows of deceased soldiers cannot be subject to payment of his debts.³ A state statute exempting pensions or other rewards for military or naval service should be liberally construed,⁴ and the exemption extends to payments received by, or on account of, any beneficiary under the laws relating to veterans.^{4,5} The facts that a recipient was already a deserter when he enlisted and that he enlisted under a fictitious name have been held not to affect his right to his exemption, under a state statute, in the amount of money he received.⁵

In so far as payments made to war veterans are governed by the early federal statutes exempting such funds only while in the course of transmission, such moneys cease to be exempt after their receipt by the veteran,⁶ but the later federal statutes exempt funds payable under any of the laws relating to veterans, whether before or after the receipt of such funds by the beneficiary.⁷

A payment of benefit received by a veteran under the federal statutes does not lose its exemption by being deposited in a bank by him,⁸ although savings deposits accumulated while the veteran was in prison have been held not exempt from payment under a prison reimbursement act for maintenance of prisoners.^{8,5}

While the exemption given to such compensation does not, under the federal statutes, extend to property purchased therewith,⁹ property so purchased may be exempt under the provisions of a state statute.¹⁰ Income, however, whether current or accumulated, received on pension funds or investment thereof has been held not exempt under either the federal or state statutes.^{10,5} A statute allowing an exemption in personal property "during the term of service of such volunteer" does not protect land bought by the debtor with his bounty money long after the debtor's service expired.¹¹

(2) Adjusted Compensation

Under federal statutes, exemption is afforded to a veteran's service certificate, bonds for which it is exchanged, the proceeds of such bonds, and the proceeds of any loan on the certificate, as long as such funds are in the hands of the veteran or other beneficiary or are otherwise traceable.

Under federal statute, benefits payable to a veteran by way of adjusted compensation under the federal statutes are exempt from attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal or equitable process.¹²

This exemption statute is binding on the states,¹³ and should be liberally construed in the veteran's favor¹⁴ to effect the legislative purpose,^{14,5} even though inequities may result to the creditors.^{14,10} The exemption extends in favor of the veteran,¹⁵ his dependents,¹⁶ his estate,¹⁷ or any beneficiary named in the act.¹⁸

Under the statute the exemption extends not only to the adjusted service certificate and bonds for which it is exchanged,¹⁹ but also to the proceeds of such bonds²⁰ while still in the form of currency actually received,²¹ and to the proceeds of any loan on the certificate as long as identifiable.²² The proceeds cease to be exempt when they lose their identity as such.²³ They do not lose their exemption by being deposited in a bank,²⁴ at least if de-

§ 45. Stock in Trade

Where a statute so provides, the stock in trade of a debtor is exempt.

Under statutes exempting the personal property of the debtor to a certain amount, the exemption may be claimed in merchandise kept by the debtor for sale for profit.⁴³ However, under some statutes the allowance of an exemption out of a "shifting stock of merchandise" is inhibited.⁴⁴ Under such a provision an exemption cannot be claimed to goods forming a part of a stock in a store.⁴⁵ The restriction, however, goes to the present condition rather than to the general nature of the stock of merchandise, so that a shifting stock of merchandise owned by a merchant ceases to be a shifting stock on his death and the closing out of the business, and his minor children will be entitled to their exemption in it.⁴⁶

Statutes exempting "tools, implements, and stock in trade." Under statutes exempting "the tools, implements and stock in trade" of any "mechanic, miner or other person"⁴⁷ or of any "merchant"⁴⁸ used or kept for the purpose of carrying on his trade or business, in some jurisdictions goods kept for sale by a merchant are regarded as included. Under such a construction the stock in trade of a retail liquor dealer may be included if his business is lawful,⁴⁹ but not if he is carrying it on without a license.⁵⁰

In other jurisdictions, the term "stock in trade" as used in conjunction with the exemption of the necessary tools and implements of any mechanic, miner, or other person, has been restricted to the form of property owned by a craftsman upon which he exercises his art, skill, or workmanship and upon which he uses the tools of his trade or business.⁵¹ Under this view the statute applies only to persons using tools or implements in their trade or business,⁵² and does not exempt the stock in trade kept for sale by one who is merely a merchant or shopkeeper.⁵³

In these states "stock in trade" means: (1) Material suitable, of course, for his particular trade,⁵⁴ which the debtor uses in manufacture, that is, material upon which he uses the tools which are exempt by law to him to produce a certain article.⁵⁵ (2) The articles manufactured or in the process of manufacture by the debtor,⁵⁶ even articles made by a tradesman at odd moments or during slack periods of his business, where this extra work may be taken as incidental to his principal occupation, and a part thereof.⁵⁷

Under this construction the exemption becomes a supplement to the exemption of the tools and implements of the debtor in order that he may have something upon which to use his tools and thus make the exemption of them to him a thing of some practical value.⁵⁸ The exemption, however, can be claimed only by tradesmen and manufacturers whose business is carried on on a small scale.⁵⁹ The statute does not apply to the stock and materials of large manufacturers,⁶⁰ nor does it exempt goods bought by a mechanic or small manufacturer merely to be sold by him again, in connection with his manufacturing business, and not to be worked up or manufactured by him, for as to these he is a mere merchant, buying and selling.⁶¹ The fact,

however, that articles manufactured by the debtor have been placed on sale by him with other property which he has bought for resale will not affect his right of exemption of his own product, provided the manufactured articles and merchandise are kept separate and distinct;⁶² but where articles are kept indiscriminately for sale and as stock for manufacture, as opportunity affords, they are not exempt as stock in trade.⁶³

Use in trade or business. Under some statutes the stock, to be exempt, must be kept and used by the debtor for carrying on his trade or business.⁶⁴ Therefore, although the stock is procured and designed for the purpose of carrying on his trade or business, it ceases to be exempt when the debtor changes his purpose to use it in his trade or business.⁶⁵ It has been held, however, that the debtor does not lose the benefit of the exemption by keeping the goods idle until they can be used to the best advantage;⁶⁶ and that the exempt stock cannot be levied on unless the debtor goes into some new business in which it will be of no material use to him.⁶⁷

Substituted stock in trade. Where a stock of goods has been set aside as exempt, and, in the regular course of trade, it has been sold by the debtor and other similar goods purchased with the proceeds, the new stock so purchased is likewise protected by the exemption.⁶⁸

§ 46. Tools, Implements, Instruments, Etc.

- a. In general
- b. What constitute tools, implements, etc.
- c. Necessity to conduct of occupation or trade
- d. Necessity of employment in occupation or trade

- e. Personal use by debtor
- f. Tools or implements of several trades or occupations
- g. Farming tools and instruments

a. In General

Under the various exemption statutes, the tools and implements of a debtor necessary for carrying on his trade or business are generally exempt.

Statutes very generally exempt to a debtor the "tools," "tools and implements," "tools and instruments," etc., necessary for carrying on his trade or business. The term "trade," as used in such statutes, is given a general meaning in preference to a restricted meaning,^{68,50} in accordance with the policy of liberal construction, as discussed infra § 46 b (1).

This exemption sometimes exists in addition to what is allowed the head of a family,⁶⁹ or independently of whether or not the debtor has a family.⁷⁰ The right to an exemption, however, does not exist in the absence of a statute conferring it.⁷¹

Articles used in trade are sometimes specifically exempted by express statutory provision, and are in that case exempt regardless of whether they may be classified as tools or not.⁷² Where a statute lists all the articles in a trade to be exempted, and contains no general clause for exemption of tools of trade, articles not listed are not exempt.⁷³

The object of a statute exempting a debtor's tools and instruments of trade is to prevent him from being deprived of the means of paying his debts and of making an honest living.⁷⁴

General commercial pursuits. A statute exempting tools and apparatus of trade from execution is not intended to apply to general commercial pursuits, which require no particular skill in the use of the tools and apparatus.^{74.5}

b. What Constitute Tools, Implements, Etc.

- (1) In general
- (2) Machinery
- (3) Printing outfits

(1) In General

The terms "tools," "implements," "instruments," etc., as used in exemption statutes, while difficult to define accurately, are frequently accorded a broad significance, taking into consideration the object of the statute granting the exemption.

75. Particular definitions

(1) A tool is a simple mechanism or instrument used in working, moving, or transforming material.

N.Y.—Northern New York Trust Co. v. Bano, 273 N.Y.S. 694, 151 Misc. 684.

(2) The term "tools," as used in exemption statutes, is presumed to embrace such implements of husbandry or of manual labor as are usually employed in, and are appropriate to, the business of the several trades or classes of the laboring community, and according to the wants of their respective employments or professions, whether farmer, mechanic, manufacturer, or, in fact, any artisan or laborer, who may require the use of such helps to obtain his living.

N.H.—Wilkinson v. Alley, 45 N.H. 551.

"Common tools of trade" construed to mean simple and indispensable appliances used in the debtor's trade. Ga.—Kirksey v. Rowe, 40 S.E. 990, 114 Ga. 893, 88 Am.S.R. 65—Lenoir v. Weeks, 20 Ga. 596.

"Working tools"

(1) "Working tools," as used in exemption statutes, are such tools as are necessary to the debtor's business and without the possession of which he is powerless to carry on his calling.

N.Y.—Sammis v. Smith, 1 Thomps. & C. 444.

(2) They are such utensils as the debtor is accustomed to use in manual work or labor in his usual occupation.

R.I.—In re Church, 2 A. 761, 15 R.I. 245.

(3) The term includes not only "working tools," so called in the dictionary and by learned men, but also such as are so called by the craft, such as the individual uses and has set apart as tools for the advantageous prosecution of his business. R.I.—Healy v. Bateman, 2 R.I. 454, 456, 60 Am.D. 94.

76. Particular definitions

(1) An implement is some tool or utensil forming a part of equipment for work.

Mont.—State ex rel. Bartol v. Justice of Peace Court of Township of Stanford, in Judith Basin County, 55 P.2d 691, 102 Mont. 1.

(2) Other definitions.

Cal.—In re McManus' Estate, 25 P. 413, 87 C. 292, 22 Am.S.R. 250, 10 L.R.A. 567.

Conn.—Atwood v. De Forest, 19 Conn. 513.

77. Same meaning as "implements"

The words "instruments" and "implements," in the exemption law, were meant to describe the same species of property and should be regarded as of identical import.

Kan.—Williams v. Vincent, 79 P. 121, 70 Kan. 595, 109 Am.S.R. 469, 68 L.R.A. 634.

78. "Apparatus" is defined as any complex device or machine designed or prepared for the accomplishment of a special purpose; any complex appliance for a specific action or operation; machinery; mechanism.

Tex.—Hinckley-Tandy Leather Co. v. Hazelwood, Civ.App., 35 S.W.2d 209 —Harris v. Townley, Civ.App., 161 S.W. 5.

(2) Machinery

(a) In general

(b) Machinery operated by power

(a) In General

Ordinarily simple and inexpensive machinery may be exempt to a debtor as a tool or implement of trade.

The term "tools" in the statutes of exemption has been held to mean simple instruments used by hand, and does not embrace such expensive and complicated machines and appliances as are used in large manufacturing establishments;⁸⁵ nor, by the weight of authority, are such machines and appliances covered by statutes exempting "tools and apparatus," "tools and implements" or "tools and instruments," of a trade or business.⁸⁶ Accordingly paper mill machinery,⁸⁷ foundry machinery,⁸⁸ and well drilling machinery⁸⁹ have been held not to be exempt under such statutes. On the other hand, simple and

Circumstances requiring strict construction

Exemption statutes are liberally construed in case of doubt whether personalty is tool or implement exempted thereby, but not if it is within class of property or articles specifically mentioned in statute or quantity or number of articles declared exempt is expressly limited.

inexpensive machines operated by hand are covered by such statutes,⁹⁰ such as cheese making implements,⁹¹ a weaver's loom,⁹² a turning lathe,⁹³ a sewing machine of a tailor⁹⁴ or shoemaker,⁹⁵ and machinery for sawing logs and making lumber.⁹⁶

It has been held, however, that a statute exempting "tools" does not exempt any machine, even machines of comparatively simple construction,⁹⁷ as a peg making machine⁹⁸ or a portable spinning machine;⁹⁹ but the word "apparatus" in a statute exempting tools and apparatus used in a trade or business is a broader term than "tools" and may embrace machinery and appliances that would not fall under the head of tools.¹

Machinery as farming tools and implements are considered infra § 46.

(b) Machinery Operated by Power

A machine may be exempt to a debtor as an implement or instrument of his trade even though it is propelled by motive power or steam.

While a machine, to be exempt as a "tool," must be operated by hand, and not by steam, electricity, or water power,² machines driven by steam, electricity, gasoline, or water may be exempt under statutes exempting to the debtor, in addition to tools, the "apparatus" or "implements" necessary for carrying on his trade or business.³ Thus a tractor has been held exempt to a farmer,⁴ or one engaged in the occupation of spreading gypsum and fertilizer in fields for farmers,^{4.5} a power driven Conn.—Flaxman v. Capitol City Press, 185 A. 417, 420, 121 Conn. 423.

In Texas

(1) "The law is still in a nebulous state as to what kind of machinery propelled by steam or electric or any power other than hand, if any, is exempt as 'tools or apparatus of trade.'"

U.S.—In re Turrentine & Thompson, D.C.Tex., 6 F.Supp. 490, 491.

(2) In an early case it was said by the supreme court: "Expensive and complicated machinery propelled by steam-power, or any power other than hand, is not exempt as 'tools of trade'; the latter phrase being held to apply only to simple instruments used by hand. . . . The word 'apparatus' used in the statute may take a wider range, and embrace such minor machinery as may be operated by hand."

Tex.—Willis v. Morris, 1 S.W. 799, 803, 66 Tex. 628, 59 Am.R. 634.

(3) This expression by the supreme court, however, was not a holding that the term "apparatus" would embrace only such minor machinery as might be operated by hand.

U.S.—In re Turrentine & Thompson, supra.

Tex.—Hinckley-Tandy Leather Co. v. Hazelwood, Civ.App., 35 S.W.2d 209.

(4) Since that decision a number of the courts of civil appeal have held machinery operated by steam, electricity, and other like power, to be exempt as "apparatus" under the statute.

Tex.—Lopez v. Naegelin, Civ.App., 59 S.W.2d 844—Hinckley - Tandy Leather Co. v. Hazelwood, supra—Harris v. Townley, Civ.App., 161 S.W. 5.

(5) However, while it is true that some recent decisions of the courts of civil appeal seem to hold that the fact that machinery is not run by hand is not the sole test of exemption, these decisions cannot and do not modify the supreme court holding that expensive and complicated machinery propelled by power other than by hand is not a tool of trade under the statute involved. Tex.—McMillan v. Dean, Civ.App., 174 S.W.2d 737.

(6) A federal court in applying the Texas statute has held that "where steam or any other power than hand is used, machinery so propelled is . . . not to be included within the statutory terms."

U.S.—Peyton v. Farmers' National Bank, C.C.A.Tex., 261 F. 326, 330.

(7) Another federal court has held that machinery too bulky and unwieldy to be operated by hand is not exempt under the statute.

U.S.—In re McFrancis, D.C.Tex., 22 F.Supp. 581.

(8) Still another federal court has held that exemption is not denied merely because the tool or apparatus is power driven.

U.S.—Meritz v. Palmer, C.A.Tex., 266 F.2d 265.

4. Tex.—Wollner v. Darnell, Civ. App., 94 S.W.2d 1225.

lathe to a mechanic,⁵ a shoe polishing and grinding machine driven by electricity to a cobbler,⁶ electrically operated baking machinery to a baker,⁷ and portable steam engines for sawing logs and making lumber to a lumberman.⁸ So also automobiles have been held exempt in some jurisdictions, as discussed infra § 54, and in jurisdictions where a printing press is exempt, infra § 46 b (3), it is generally held that the fact that it is operated by steam or electricity and not by hand or foot power is immaterial.⁹

(3) Printing Outfits

While it has been held that the tools and apparatus of a debtor used in his trade of printing are exempt, the authorities differ as to whether his printing presses, cases, and type are exempt.

While it has been held that the tools and apparatus owned and used by a debtor in his trade or profession of printing or publishing are exempt,¹⁰ there is a direct conflict in the decisions as to whether the printing presses, cases, and type of a printer are within the statutes exempting tools. In some jurisdictions they are exempt.¹¹ In other jurisdictions, however, they are not exempt.¹² In any event, ponderous power driven, expensive, and complicated machines and appliances used in large printing or publishing establishments are not exempt to the debtor as his tools or apparatus of trade.¹³

c. Necessity to Conduct of Occupation or Trade

To be exempt, a debtor's tools and instruments must be necessary to his trade or occupation.

Statutes exempting tools, instruments, etc., generally require that they shall be necessary for the debtor's trade or occupation; and where this requirement is not expressed it is generally implied.¹⁴ This requirement excludes tools, instruments, etc., which are not necessary to enable the debtor to work at his trade or occupation,¹⁵ but does not require that they shall be indispensable and allows those to be included which enable the debtor to carry on his trade conveniently and in the usual manner.¹⁶ So an implement may be exempt even though it is larger than necessary,¹⁷ and even though it may be possible for the debtor to secure employment with another person who will supply it.¹⁸ When a chattel has been so employed by its owner as to acquire the quality of a tool or instrument necessary to the exercise of a trade, business, or profession, in order to divest such chattel of that quality, proof of such fact must be unusually clear.^{18.5}

ing wood⁴⁹ for a lumberman; a horse or team,⁵⁰ a wagon,⁵¹ sled,⁵² and harness⁵³ for a teamster; a wagon and harness for an express man;⁵⁴ an omnibus for a hotel keeper;⁵⁵ a wagon for an itinerant lecturer;⁵⁶ a horse, wagon, and harness for an assayer;⁵⁷ tanks, pumps,^{57.5} and other similar equipment^{57.10} used by a wholesale distributor of petroleum products; a bicycle for a painter and bill poster;⁵⁸ embalming satchels and instruments, embalming boards, couches, canopies, rugs, pedestals, candelabras, door crapes, transfer cases, ice boxes, church trucks, catafalques, and undertakers' wagons and even wearing apparel for an undertaker;⁵⁹ and a photographic lens for a photographer,⁶⁰ in those jurisdictions where a photographer is held to be a person engaged in trade, as discussed supra § 24.

On the other hand, an implement which is not practically related to the particular calling in question cannot be held exempt on this ground.⁶¹ A grain mill is not exempt for a hotel keeper;⁶² or a watch for a plumber;⁶³ or a watch and chain for a cigar maker;⁶⁴ or a bicycle for an architect;⁶⁵ or a buggy and harness for a loan and insurance agent;⁶⁶ or a gum vending machine for a barber;⁶⁷ or a rifle for a professional guide for hunters and fishermen.⁶⁸

A debtor may require several tools of the same kind for his business, and their duplication will not,

therefore, of itself, deprive any one of them of its exempt character as a necessary tool, under the section exempting necessary tools generally,⁶⁹ even though only one is exempt under another section of the same law providing for specific exemptions;⁷⁰ but, as appears supra § 46 a, in the absence of a clause exempting necessary tools generally, a debtor will be restricted to the number of articles fixed by the specific exemption section.

Fairly usable in trade. A statute exempting all tools, apparatus, and books belonging to any trade or profession exempts tools or apparatus fairly belonging to, or usable in, the trade;^{70.5} but the exemption does not extend to articles such as furniture and fixtures and other equipment which have merely a general value and use in setting up a business establishment.^{70.10}

d. Necessity of Employment in Occupation or Trade

To be exempt, tools and instruments of a debtor must be kept for actual use in his trade.

The statutes often expressly require that the tools and implements which they exempt shall be used by the debtor to earn his living, or to carry on his trade or business, their necessity for this purpose being the reason for exempting them;⁷¹ and by the weight of authority, when such a condition is not expressed, it is to be implied.⁷² The test in determining whether the property is exempt is whether the debtor will be deprived of a tool or instrument necessary for the exercise of his calling, trade, or profession and whether such loss will prevent him from continuing to follow the calling, trade, or profession in which he has been engaged and in which the particular property has been used.^{72.5} Under these statutes the "tools" of a mechanic or other person must be kept for actual use in his trade,⁷³ not merely for his pleasure or convenience.⁷⁴ It is not necessary, however, that the tools be required for immediate use,⁷⁵ or that they be in actual use at the time of the levy,⁷⁶ or that they shall yet have been used.⁷⁷

e. Personal Use of Debtor

By the weight of authority, tools used in the debtor's business may be exempt even though used by his employees and assistants, provided the tools are not, in effect, capital used for the purpose of profit in the operation of an extensive business.

It has been held that the tools claimed as exempt must be used by the debtor himself, and that those used by his employees are subject to execution;⁷⁸ but this is not the general rule, and, by the weight of authority, a debtor who carries on a small business, and gives his personal attention to it, is entitled to exemption in the tools employed in it, even though used by his employees and assistants,⁷⁹ although the rule is otherwise where the tools are in effect capital used for the purpose of profit in the operation of an extensive business.⁸⁰ A tool which requires more than one man to operate it may nevertheless be a tool used by the debtor himself and so exempt under the statute.⁸¹

f. Tools or Implements of Several Trades or Occupations

Unless a statute provides otherwise, a debtor engaged in several occupations may claim as exempt the tools or instruments used in either or both of them, if their value does not exceed the statutory limit.

Under a statute exempting a debtor's tools and implements of trade, or other property necessary for carrying on his trade or business, a person engaged in several occupations, all of which are covered by the exemption laws, may claim as exempt the tools or other property used in either of them,⁸² if their value does not exceed the statutory limit.⁸³

By the weight of authority, unless the statute in terms applies to a single business only, he may claim the tools or other property used in more than one business if the value of all is within the statutory limit.⁸⁴ Particularly is this so where the trades are of a kindred nature;⁸⁵ but a debtor cannot, by multiplying his employments, claim cumulatively several exemptions, created by the statute for several distinct pursuits.⁸⁶ Thus, under a statute exempting the tools and implements of a mechanic, miner, or other person, not exceeding a certain sum in value, a debtor cannot, by carrying on the business of a mechanic and miner at the same time, double his exemption.⁸⁷

"Principal" business. There are statutes in some states exempting the tools, implements, etc., necessary to enable a person to carry on the business in which he is "wholly or principally" engaged. Under these statutes his exemption is of course restricted to the tools, implements, etc., of one trade.⁸⁸ Such statutes, when a person is engaged in two or more occupations, are to be construed as referring to the one on which he chiefly relies for a livelihood, and which engrosses most of his time and attention throughout the year,⁸⁹ not necessarily, however, the one that brings him in the most income.⁹⁰ It is not necessary, however, that the debtor should devote any particular amount of time to his business;⁹¹ and the fact that he uses his tool or implement in more than one business or trade does not affect his right of exemption if the implement is appropriate and necessary for his principal business.⁹²

Generally the tools and instruments of a farmer necessary to operate his farm are exempt to him.

Statutes sometimes expressly exempt farmers' tools and implements, and statutes exempting the necessary tools or implements of a debtor, without restriction as to occupation, have been held impliedly to exempt the tools of a farmer, as well as those of a mechanic.⁹³ To be exempt, however, the particular tool or instrument must be necessary to the operation of the debtor's farm;⁹⁴ and, when one claims as exempt "an implement of husbandry," it must appear that the implement in question is suitable for that occupation.⁹⁵ What is suitable or necessary depends to some extent at least on the conditions attending agriculture in the jurisdiction where the question arises,⁹⁶ and the number of articles exempt may be considerably increased under such statutory terms as "materials," "stock," or "apparatus."⁹⁷

It has been held in some states that statutes exempting tools and implements of husbandry exempt only such implements as are used by hand;⁹⁸ but in other states the statutes are given a broader construction, and are held to cover ordinary farm implements not used exclusively by hand, and even expensive and improved implements and machinery, the conflict of opinion being accounted for undoubtedly, quite as much by varying farming methods and practices in different parts of the country, as by the phrasing of the statutes. So under various statutes the exemption has been held to extend to binders,⁹⁹ buzz saws,¹ cream separators,² bee-

A statute which enumerates as property exempt the homestead of the family and all implements of husbandry does not restrict the exemption to such implements of husbandry as are used in the cultivation of the homestead, but all implements, provided they are necessary for the debtor's use in husbandry, are exempt.²⁵

If the debtor uses the implement in question principally in work for hire on other people's farms, and only incidentally on his own farm, the implement is not exempt;²⁶ but, if the debtor uses the implement in question principally in work on his farm, the fact that it is used in harvesting the crops of others will not take it out of the statute.²⁷ The debtor is not confined to any one branch of farming, but has an exemption of all the necessary tools used by a debtor in diversified farming,²⁸ but he is confined to only that number of implements which is necessary.²⁹

§ 47. Wages, Salary, and Earnings

- a. In general
- b. Definition and scope of terms
- c. Effect of payment or nonpayment
- d. Salary or compensation of public officers

a. In General

Although statutes granting an exemption are to be liberally construed, wages, salary, and earnings, including wages of seamen, are not exempt unless an exemption is allowed by constitutional or statutory provisions.

Wages, salary, and earnings of a debtor are not exempt³² unless an exemption is allowed by constitutional or statutory provisions.³³ Such provisions should be liberally construed so as to accomplish their purpose of extending protection to those in need.³⁴ Under the most common provision, "wages" of a mechanic or laborer are specifically made exempt.³⁵ Under other statutes, however, all earnings are made exempt without restriction to the earnings of a class.³⁶ In some jurisdictions a claimant of this particular exemption must be the head of a family.³⁷

Under a statute exempting "personal property" to a certain amount, an exemption may be claimed in wages, salary, or compensation,³⁸ and, where a statute so provides, this exemption may be claimed in addition to a special exemption of wages, salary, or compensation to a stated amount.³⁹ It does not necessarily follow, however, from the fact that wages are personal property that a statute exempting "other property, real and personal or mixed in lieu of exempt property," is intended to exempt wages as "other personal property" unless such is the legislative intent.⁴⁰

Residents and nonresidents. Under some statutes the earnings of persons who are actual residents are made exempt⁴¹ provided they are actual residents at the time of the issuance of the writ or process sought to be enforced.⁴² Under the terms of particular statutes a nonresident may be entitled to the exemption.⁴³ Under other statutes a larger exemption is given to residents than to nonresidents⁴⁴ and this discrimination has been held to be constitutional.⁴⁵

Wages earned out of state. Under a statute exempting wages earned out of state from attachment or garnishment, where the cause of action arises elsewhere and the principal defendant is not personally served with process, where the principal defendant's wages are in fact paid and payable by the garnishee in another state, such wages are exempt.^{45.5}

Contention that wages were not payable out of state because garnishee was not shown to be under legal obligation to pay them there is without merit.

Ill.—Hertz Corp. v. Taylor, supra.

Necessity for support of family; necessities. Under some statutes wages or earnings necessary for the support of the debtor or his family are exempt.⁴⁶ The word "necessaries," the money required for which is exempt from execution, is a relative term and the scope of its legal signification has been restricted or enlarged according to the circumstances and conditions of the parties.^{46.5} It includes many of the conveniences of refined society,^{46.10} and what is a necessary of life must, to a considerable extent, be committed to the sound discretion of the trier of fact.^{46.15} In order to be entitled to such exemption the debtor must show that they are required for this purpose.⁴⁷ The exemption afforded by such statutes is not lost unless the debtor fails to collect or receive his earnings, within the time prescribed, after he becomes entitled to receive them,⁴⁸ and he is entitled to such exemption notwithstanding his earnings first become due subsequent to the institution of supplementary proceedings seeking to reach them.⁴⁹ A transfer by the debtor of his personal earnings to a member of the family not supported by his labor cannot be justified as a transfer of property already exempt under such statutes;⁵⁰ nor can the debtor's payment out of his earnings of bills for supplies previously furnished be justified on that ground.⁵¹ Where the statute in terms requires that wages to be exempt should be necessary "for the use of a family, wholly or partly supported by his (the debtor's) labor," the existence of a family is necessary,⁵² and one having no family is not entitled to the exemption.⁵³

Payment overdue. The mere fact that payment of salary is overdue does not deprive one, otherwise entitled, of the protection of an exemption statute.⁵⁴

Salary earned. In the absence of a statute providing therefor, fund representing salary earned,^{54.5} whether in the possession of the employer, the employee, or a third person,^{54.10} is not exempt.

Retirement annuity of employees. A nonassignable annuity paid to former employees under a retirement plan has been held to be exempt.⁵⁵

Wages of seamen. In the absence of statute a seaman's wages are not exempt.⁵⁶ However, under federal exemption statutes relating to "seamen," discussed generally supra § 24, their wages are exempt.⁵⁷ Under such statutes the wages of persons not included within the occupation of "seaman" are not exempt.⁵⁸ However, it has been held that the wages of seamen engaged in coastwise trade

(a) In General

The term "wages" as used in exemption statutes implies a relation of employer and employee and has been restricted to compensation paid for manual labor, although there is authority to the effect that compensation for services calling for special skill and intellectual fitness is to be included.

The term "wages" as used in exemption statutes implies a relation of employer and employee⁶¹ and does not include the gain, profit, or recompense which accrues to one who is conducting a business of his own and on his own account.⁶²

In some jurisdictions the meaning of the term "wages," has been restricted to compensation for manual labor,⁶³ and as not including compensation for services for which special skill and intellectual fitness are required.⁶⁴ The word "wages," however, is considered a generic term and will not be construed to mean only menial, manual labor;^{64.5} and the term will include compensation for services where the exercise of mental ability is only incidentally involved,⁶⁵ as where it forms the principal part of only a small portion of the debtor's service as compared to that part of his labor which is purely physical.⁶⁶

In other jurisdictions, statutes exempting wages include both wages of those whose labor is chiefly manual and the compensation or salaries of those whose service calls for special skill or intellectual fitness,⁶⁷ even though the exemption is "of the wag-

Current wages. Under some constitutional and the sale of crops by the person producing them in an agricultural enterprise on his own account are not, however, "current wages or earnings."⁷⁹ The amount of compensation need not be fixed by the contract of hiring in order to render the compensation for the service "current wages" within the meaning of the statute.⁸⁰

Past-due wages left voluntarily in the hands of the employer beyond the prescribed exemption period are not exempt under provisions exempting "current wages or earnings,"⁸¹ although the exempt character of "current wages" is not destroyed by the act of the employer in retaining them over the protest of the employee.⁸² "Current wages" have been held to cease to be such on receipt by the wage earner⁸³ and this is so notwithstanding they are kept by him as a separate fund.⁸⁴

Fund created in part by others. Where the exemption is of "wages for labor performed by" the debtor, a fund created in part by the labor of others is not exempt,⁸⁵ except in the case of a fund created by labor of the debtor together with his wife and minor children.⁸⁶

Judgment for wages. The reduction of a claim for wages to judgment does not destroy the employee's right to exemption therein.⁸⁷ Money recovered as wages by an employee who has been wrongfully discharged before the expiration of his

(b) Earnings under Special Contract

The earnings or compensation of an independent contractor are not exempt as "wages," although earnings or compensation received by persons under other types of special contracts have been held to be exempt as "wages."

The compensation of a person who is really an independent contractor and not an employee is not exempt as "wages."⁹¹ The earnings of a person not engaged under the usual contract of employment as laborer or artisan are, however, often considered wages within the meaning of the statutory exemption.⁹² Thus, where the remuneration is according to the work done, and not according to the length of employment, it has been still considered wages,⁹³ even though the laborer himself employs a helper to aid him in part of his work.⁹⁴

The fact that there was no agreement that the debtor should receive his wages periodically as is customary,⁹⁵ or the fact that there was no agreement whatever as to when he should receive his pay,⁹⁶ or what the amount of it should be,⁹⁷ does not put the debtor without the pale of the exemption.

Where a person is not himself a contractor or employer of labor, but merely a supervisor of their work, the fact that his compensation is fixed at a percentage of the aggregate payroll of all workmen under his supervision does not make him a contractor, but is simply a method of determining the amount of what in reality is wages in compensation for his work;⁹⁸ nor do the facts that one employed as foreman is paid a sum to cover the expenses of his department and that he hires and pays his employees convert him from an employee into an independent contractor within contemplation of an exemption statute.⁹⁹ The mere fact that a workman's wages are determined by contract does not make him a contractor within the meaning of the rule barring contractors from the benefits of the wage exemption statute;¹ it may or it may not, depending on the real character of the business relation existing between the contracting parties.² Where the relationship is that of employer and employee, the contract merely fixing the amount and method of payment of employee's compensation, the compensation is "wages," within the meaning of the statute.³ If a contractor performs labor and the amount due him for his labor is separable from the amount due to other elements arising out of the contract, the exemption may be allowed for the wages proper;⁴ but if the wages proper are not distinguishable from the rest no exemption can be allowed,⁵ even though the total amount due is less than the whole exemption allowed by statute.⁶

Payment of commissions to an employee is a payment for work done, and is "wages" within the meaning of the statute,⁷ and the nature of the payment is not changed by payment of a stipulated amount each month by the employer to his employee on his commission account.⁸

Labor for consideration other than money. Under a contract by which the debtor exchanges his labor for a consideration other than money,⁹ as the rent of a house,¹⁰ or a piece of land,¹¹ or a share in the crop grown by a cropper on the landlord's property,¹² the value of his labor is nevertheless considered wages.

(2) "Wages or Salary;" "Wages, Salary, or Hire"

"Wages or salary" or "wages, salary, or hire" are exempt under some statutes, and the fact that compensation is paid in the form of commissions does not render it any the less exempt as wages or salary.

Under statutes expressly so providing, the "wages or salary" of the debtor is exempt.¹³ While "salary" is a broader term than "wages," and applies undoubtedly to employees whose services may be characterized as mental rather than manual,¹⁴ it is not so broad as to include all compensation for services.¹⁵ It still implies an employer and employee relation,¹⁶ so that a compensation for service under circumstances where that relation does not exist is not "salary" within the meaning of the exemption laws.¹⁷ Thus, the idea involved in the words "wages or salary" is compensation for personal services as distinguished from the profits realized in commercial dealings or returns from investments or capital, or returns from the labor of others.^{17.5}

Money received under a contract requiring the debtor when called on to perform certain services may be exempt as "salary," notwithstanding he has not been requested to perform services.¹⁸ Money adjudged to be due by a corporate stockholder under his stockholder's liability to an employee of the corporation for salary unpaid by the corporation has been held to be exempt as "salary."¹⁹

A statute exempting "wages, salary, or hire of any laborer or employee" includes all compensation paid for personal services.²⁰

Commissions and profits; traveling expenses. The fact that compensation is paid to an employee in the form of commissions does not render it any the less exempt as wages or salary.²¹ However, such exemption is restricted to compensation to the employee for services rendered by him personally²² and will not be extended to additional compensation received by him for services of others whom he in his turn employs;²³ nor can an interest in the profits of the business over and above a salary received from it be included in the exemption of wages or salary.²⁴ Exemption of "wages or salary" of an employee does not cover commissions earned by a factor or broker²⁵ or selling agent,²⁶ or a share in the profits of a joint enterprise,²⁷ in none of which cases does the relation of employer and employee exist.²⁸

Allowances for traveling expenses are included within a statute exempting "wages, salary, or hire" of an employee.²⁹

(3) "Earnings" or "Personal Earnings"

"Earnings" are the fruit or reward of labor, and the expressions "earnings," "personal earnings," and the like, as used in exemption statutes, have a broader meaning than the terms "wages" and "salary," and may include earnings of a private and independent business.

"Earnings," within a statute exempting the earnings of a debtor for his personal services from liability for debt, are the fruit or reward of labor, or the price for services performed.^{29,50} The expressions "earnings," "personal earnings," and "earnings for personal services" used in some of the exemption statutes, are clearly broader than the terms "wages" and "salary,"³⁰ although, wages and salaries are exempt as "earnings" under such a statute.³¹

While "wages" and "salary" exemptions are based on an employer and employee relation, as considered supra subdivision b (2) of this section, "earnings" and "personal earnings" include earnings from a private and independent business, where the services of the debtor are the chief factor in it.³²

Thus they include the earnings of professional men,³³ and of artists,³⁴ photographers,³⁵ one keeping roomers,³⁶ or agents selling goods on commission.³⁷ As a general rule, however, these terms, with the probable exception of the term "earnings" simply,³⁸ do not include a debtor's income arising from a business involving other elements of gain than his personal services, as the employment of capital³⁹ or assistants.⁴⁰

There are decisions, however, in which earnings of a debtor in a business in which he employed assistants have been held exempt as earnings for personal services.⁴¹ In these cases the distinction is made between businesses in which the debtor's services are the chief factor, in which case the profits of the business are held to be personal earnings, and exempt under the statute,⁴² even though such business is conducted with the assistance of others,⁴³ and a business in which the profits of the business represent the services of others than the debtor, and in which the debtor's service does not predominate, in which case the profits are not personal earnings of the debtor.⁴⁴

Where a debtor's income is derived from a business involving other elements of gain than his personal services, he is entitled to an exemption in as much thereof as is necessary to compensate him for his own personal labor, provided it can be ascertained,⁴⁵ notwithstanding he might use some capital or credit, tools or equipment, or other property as an aid in producing such income.^{45.5} If the amount due the debtor because of personal labor cannot be distinguished from the rest, no part of such income will be exempt as "personal earnings" under the statute.⁴⁶

Compensation for personal services performed become "earnings received," and entitled to exemption under applicable statute, as soon as such compensation is earned.⁴⁷

Disability benefits under a life policy do not represent "earnings of the debtor for his personal services," within a statute exempting such earnings from an application for the satisfaction of a judgment.^{47.5}

the total salary or earnings are in excess of the statutory exemption.^{47.10}

Wages of a debtor's wife for her personal services have been held not to be exempt under the statute as earnings of the debtor for his personal services.⁴⁸

(4) Income

The word "income" within exemption statutes has a broad meaning and is used to define the proceeds of labor, or the receipts of a profession, business, or occupation.

The word "income," used in some of the exemption statutes, is a broader term than those previously discussed in subdivision b of this section and is used to define the proceeds of labor, or the receipts of a profession, business, or occupation.⁴⁹ In a statute exempting wages, salary, or income, the term "income" should be construed to mean income earned by labor.⁵⁰ Where a statute exempts a certain amount per month of the debtor's income, the context indicates that the income cannot consist of property in kind or of any kind of property which cannot be measured in denominations of money per month so as to determine what the income is per month, although it is not necessarily payable at fixed times or in fixed amounts.⁵¹

c. Effect of Payment or Nonpayment

Mere payment of wages or salary has been held not to deprive them of their exempt character as long as they can be identified, although it has also been held that payment renders them nonexempt.

In the absence of a specific statutory provision, money due for wages and salary, but unpaid, has been held not to be exempt.⁵² However, under statutes so providing, earnings, wages, and income, on becoming due, are exempt⁵³ notwithstanding they have not been paid to the debtor.⁵⁴ The legislative policy expressed by such a statute is the preservation for employees and their families of the fruits of mental or manual labor in order that their earnings may go to supply their daily needs without hindrance from their creditors.^{54.5}

According to some authorities a statute exempting the wages or earnings of a debtor protects them not only in the hands of the employer, but also while passing from him to the debtor, and even after they are in the hands of the debtor, as long as they are capable of identification.⁵⁵ There are, however, decisions to the effect that payment of wages or earnings operates to deprive them of their exempt character.⁵⁶ Nevertheless the taking of a nonnegotiable instrument, as a nonnegotiable note or duebill, for wages due is not payment of the wages, and they may still be claimed as exempt;⁵⁷ and where it is proper for the employer to deposit the debtor's salary in a bank account for the use of the debtor's wife, such deposit does not destroy the exemption

The salary or compensation of public officers ordinarily is exempt.

Independently of statute, and frequently as a result of special statutory provisions, the salary or compensation of public officers is exempt.⁵⁹ It has been held that any employee in a public office is a public officer within the meaning of the special statutes granting exemptions,⁶⁰ an officer elected by the people being particularly within such provisions.⁶¹

Among officers whose salary or compensation is exempt are assessors,⁶² a clerk of a recorder's court,⁶³ an employee of a city board of health,⁶⁴ an inspector of municipal water board,⁶⁵ a fireman,⁶⁶ the keeper of a poor farm,⁶⁷ a sheriff,⁶⁸ and teachers.⁶⁹ On the other hand, persons whose salary or compensation has been held not to be exempt as that of public officers include streetcar conductors⁷⁰ and privately employed policemen.⁷¹

Sometimes the salary of a public officer falls within the general provision for the exemption of salaries or personal earnings,⁷² or an exemption may be found in the form of an exception in a statute subjecting corporations to garnishment for the salaries of its officers.⁷³

Fees of office on changing their status and becoming part of the personal estate of the owner are no longer, it has been held, entitled to exemption.⁷⁴

§ 48. — Amount of Wages and Time within Which Earned

- a. In general
- b. Amount necessary for debtor's family
- c. Earnings within fixed period
- d. Earnings to fixed amount within fixed period
- e. Amount per day, week, or month; percentage

a. In General

As will be observed in subsequent subdivisions of this section, statutes exempting salary, wages, or earnings may restrict such exemption with respect to the amount and the time within which earned.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

b. Amount Necessary for Debtor's Family

Under some statutes the exemption of wages, salary, or earnings is restricted to the amount necessary for the debtor's family.

Under some statutes wages, salary, or earnings for a certain period are exempt to the extent that they are necessary for the use of the debtor's family.⁷⁵ The purpose of such statutes is to allow a debtor enough money to maintain a basic standard of living in order that he may have a fair chance to remain a productive member of the community,^{75.5} and to protect his family from privation and want.^{75.10} What is necessary depends largely on the circumstances of each case and the position of the family involved⁷⁶ and the determination must, to a considerable extent, be committed to the sound discretion of the trier of fact.⁷⁷ If all the earnings of the debtor for the statutory period are necessary he may hold all,⁷⁸ but wages or earnings which exceed the amount needed for the support of a family will not be exempted.⁷⁹ In computing the amount necessary for the support of the debtor's family, deductions for social security and the like should be taken into account.⁸⁰

Some statutes restrict exemptions of wages, salary, or earnings to the amount earned by the debtor within a prescribed period.

Under some statutes an exemption is conferred as to the entire amount earned by the debtor within the period fixed, irrespective of the needs of the debtor's family, and without limitation of amount.⁸¹

"Necessaries" as relative term
The word "necessaries," money required for which is exempt from execution, is relative term, and scope of its legal signification has been restricted or enlarged according to circumstances and conditions of parties concerned.

Cal.—Sanker v. Humborg, 119 P.2d 433, 48 C.A.2d 205.

Adult child

Under statute, expenses on behalf of minor daughters incidental to attendance at university were for "necessaries" but adult daughter was not a member of "debtor's family" and earnings expended in sending such daughter did not fall within exemption.

Sum necessary less than total pay
Where one-half of judgment debtor's take-home pay for personal services rendered within thirty days of levy was released as exempt, fact, if true, that judgment debtor needed sum in excess of one-half but less than all of such take-home pay for support of his family during period in question would not justify release of other half.

Cal.—Snyder v. Swenson, 311 P.2d 644, 151 C.A.2d Supp. 847.

Discretion not abused

Where judgment debtor had earned and collected two thousand four hundred sixty dollars during three-month period, trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow an exemption of the whole amount on the theory that it was necessary for support of debtor's family.

Okl.—Smith v. Britton, 89 P.2d 953, 185 Okl. 76.

80. Earnings in excess of amount necessary for support

Earnings in excess of the amount necessary to support the wage earner's family are exempt where it appears that deductions for social security, unemployment reserve, and the like, when added to the amount actually necessary to support the wage earner's family, exceed the amount of his income.

81. Iowa.—McCoy v. Cornell, 40 Iowa 457.

Some statutes exempt wages for the fixed period whenever earned,⁸² and are not restricted to wages earned during the period named immediately preceding the service of the process.⁸³ However, a statute exempting wages due for a time not exceeding a fixed period next preceding the service of the process exempts only the wages due for labor done during the period named immediately preceding the service of process,⁸⁴ and wages for work performed prior to a fixed exemption period are not exempt.^{84.5}

Duration of exemption period. Under statutes exempting earnings during a fixed period, the exemption expires at the end of the period and is not extended by voluntarily leaving the earnings with the employer,⁸⁵ or by the fact that the earnings are in the hands of the debtor's wife,⁸⁶ or by legal proceedings necessary to reduce the wages to the employee's possession.⁸⁷

Where the statute exempts all of the income earned by the debtor for a fixed period, the creditor must wait until the income for the period stated has accumulated in order to determine the amount of his exemption,⁸⁸ and he cannot seize the debtor's income by garnishment for succeeding periods shorter in duration than the statutory period.⁸⁹ Moreover, under a statute exempting a specified sum of the salary, income, or wages of a person per month, in computing the exemption of one who is paid part of a month's wages in the following month the wages received for both months should be added and the exemptions for two months deducted.⁹⁰

Statutes exempting "current wages" for a fixed period are held to be applicable only as long as wages currently earned are not collected,⁹¹ and wages voluntarily left in the possession of the employer after they become due cease to be "current" within the meaning of such statutes.⁹² However, past-due wages left with the employer under compulsion,⁹³ or misapprehension as to the state of accounts,⁹⁴ do not cease to be "current wages" within the meaning of the statute. Under particular statutes "current wages or earnings" are limited to those earned within a prescribed time prior to the levy of process sought to be enforced.⁹⁵

d. Earnings to Fixed Amount within Fixed Period

Under some statutes the exemption of wages, salary, or earnings is limited to a fixed amount earned within a fixed period.

Under some statutes the exemption of wages, salary, or earnings, is limited to a certain amount earned within a specified time.⁹⁶ Such a statute has been construed to apply only to the amount remaining in the employee's hands and without regard as to what has been paid to the debtor during the statutory period.⁹⁷

Under statutes not merely limiting the amount earned within the statutory period to a definite sum but further providing that a minimum allowance shall be exempt in all cases, the provisions for minimum exemption are included as a part of the maximum amount allowed and are not additional to it.⁹⁸

e. Amount per Day, Week, or Month; Percentage

Under some statutes, the exemption of wages is restricted to a certain amount per day, week, or month. Some statutes restrict exemptions of wages, salary, or earnings to a certain percentage thereof.

Under some statutes the exemption of wages cannot exceed a certain amount per day, week, or month⁹⁹ or the wages are subject to such limitation in cases in which it is sought to enforce the exemption against debts of a particular nature.¹ The full amount of wages due up to the statutory limit may be exempted as against an ordinary creditor, even though as between employer and employee the amount due may be decreased by deductions which the employer is authorized to make for supplies furnished to his employee.² Where the statute exempts all wages up to a fixed weekly amount, an accumulation of wages where the rate is less than the statutory limit is exempt.³

Under some statutes wages, salary, or earnings are exempt up to a specified percentage,⁴ regardless of need,^{4.5} of the entire earned compensation⁵ or of the compensation earned within a prescribed period.⁶ Under some statutes, in addition to the limitation by percentage, a specified sum must remain exempt from seizure in every case;⁷ but under such statutes the total amount earned by an employee in any month, including any amount paid on account, must be considered in determining how much of the total earnings of a particular period should be considered exempt.^{7.5}

Computation. In computing the amount of exemption under statutes restricting such exemption to a certain amount per day, week, or month, an employee who is paid for his time according to the days or parts thereof that he works is entitled to exemption of his wages as "daily" rather than as "weekly or monthly" wages;⁸ where employment is by the day the exemption is calculated according to the number of days actually worked;⁹ the wages actually earned by the employee under his contract of employment are to be considered and not the amount which may be due him after deductions made with his consent;¹⁰ and the mere fact that payment is made on a piecework basis does not preclude the employment from being by the day within the contemplation of such statutes.¹¹ In computing the exemption of an employee under a statute exempting earnings up to a specified amount per week, compensation received by him in addition to money is to be included.¹² A statute exempting income to a certain amount per month includes what the debtor may have collected from his employer or may have received from his income from any other source during the month as well as the sum that may belong to him earned or collectable from any source but not actually received by him at the time legal process is served.¹³

Under a statute providing that where husband and wife are living together, the aggregate of the earnings, salaries, insurance, annuities, and pension or retirement payments of the husband and wife shall be the amount which shall be determinative of the exemption of either, the husband's unemployment compensation, which is exempt, may not be aggregated with the wife's earnings in determining her exemption, in the absence of circumstances depriving the husband of his exemption in the unemployment compensation.^{13.5}

§ 49. — Future Wages or Earnings

A creditor will not be permitted, by garnishment proceedings, to reach a debtor's future wages or earnings, so as to defeat his right to claim them as exempt when they become due.

A creditor cannot reach the debtor's future wages or earnings by garnishment proceedings, so as to defeat his right to claim them as exempt when they become due,¹⁴ and wages earned but not payable are future wages within the meaning of this rule;¹⁵ nor can the creditor get at the debtor's wages over and above the amount allowed as exempt by making the writ in garnishment returnable to a term of court long subsequent to its execution.¹⁶ It is otherwise under a statute expressly providing that wages accruing after service of a writ of attachment and before trial shall be bound by the writ.¹⁷ Some statutes allow a certain percentage of prospective earnings to be reached.¹⁸

§ 50. — Property Purchased with Earnings

According to some authorities property purchased with earnings that are exempt is likewise exempt.

Whether the exemption in wages or personal earnings covers property purchased by the wages or personal earnings is a question on which the authorities differ. In some jurisdictions the property is not exempt;¹⁹ in others it is,²⁰ but only to the extent of the amount exempted by the statute,²¹ and, where the property purchased is a homestead, it is exempt only as long as it is owned and occupied as a homestead.²² Property purchased in excess of the amount allowed by law as exempt will not be exempt.²³

§ 51. Workmen's Compensation

Under some statutes workmen's compensation, claims therefor, and payments or benefits due are exempt.

Under some statutory provisions payments or benefits due under workmen's compensation statutes, as well as compensation, or claims therefor, are exempt.²⁴ The protection of such provisions has been held to extend to compensation or benefits actually paid and collected²⁵ and deposited in a bank,²⁶ particularly when not mingled with other funds.²⁷ However, it has also been held that such statutes do not operate to exempt compensation actually collected or received by the injured employee,²⁸ particularly when deposited in a bank²⁹ and mingled with other funds of the employee.³⁰

A judgment in favor of a claimant for workmen's compensation has been held to be exempt under a statute exempting a claim for compensation or a payment due.³¹ Moreover, a judgment against third persons for negligence resulting in the compensable injury has been held to be exempt as a "benefit" entitled to exemption under a compensation statute when no award has yet been made.³²

A statutory provision for the exemption of compensation has been held to operate only during the lifetime of the injured employee,³³ affording no protection to those who succeed to his property at death,³⁴ at least where there is no surviving spouse, minor child, or dependent of the workman.^{34.5}

§ 52. Wearing Apparel, Yarn, and Cloth

The debtor's wearing apparel is generally exempt property, and under some statutes this exemption includes yarn and cloth.

In view of the common-law rule that an officer is not authorized to commit a trespass on the person of defendant and thereby provoke a breach of the peace, which gives rise to the rule that wearing apparel is not subject to levy and sale under an execution, see Executions § 19, it seems that even in the absence of a statute expressly so providing wearing apparel is exempt property.³⁸ Ordinarily, under the various statutes, the debtor's wearing apparel, sometimes to the extent of a particular value, is exempt.³⁹

There is quite a diversity of opinion among the courts as to what constitutes "wearing apparel" within the exemption.⁴⁰ The term "wearing apparel" has been taken to mean clothing and to apply only to garments worn to protect the person from exposure.⁴¹ It has also been held to include all of the articles of dress generally worn by persons in the locality and condition of life of the claimant, including whatever is necessary to decent appearance and protection from the changes of weather, and also to what is reasonably proper and customary in that community in the way of ornament.⁴² The term does not include traveling trunks⁴³ or mahogany cabinet boxes in which the wearing apparel may be kept.⁴⁴ Likewise, wearing apparel does not include clothing purchased by a firm of which the debtor is a member, and held by such firm for sale.⁴⁵

Under some statutes "necessary" wearing apparel is exempt.⁴⁶ "Necessary" wearing apparel includes such articles as are reasonably required for the convenience and comfort of the debtor and his family, and is not limited to such as are indispensable.⁴⁷ In determining whether any article is necessary for the debtor's use, it would seem logical to inquire whether it is reasonable and proper for use in the home and in social intercourse in view of the debtor's insolvency; but no distinction can be based on the previous financial or social position of the insolvent debtor, otherwise the statute would operate unequally between the rich and the poor.⁴⁸ Such a statute exempts clothing suitable and reasonably necessary for all seasons of the year,⁴⁹ and it may exempt an extra suit.⁵⁰

Where the statute in terms exempts "wearing apparel" or "all wearing apparel," without restricting it to such as is necessary, questions as to its value, if bought in good faith as wearing apparel,⁵¹

or the frequency of its use,⁵² or its appropriateness to the debtor's condition of life,⁵³ cannot be inquired into. Under such statutes a lace shawl⁵⁴ and a Masonic uniform⁵⁵ have been held to be exempt. Masonic regalia, with the exception of the hat, however, has been held not to be exempt under other statutes.⁵⁶

"Necessary wearing apparel" includes cloth put into the hands of a tailor and cut up by him into shape for a coat for the debtor.⁵⁷ It even includes cloth and trimmings put into the hands of a tailor to be made up into clothing for the debtor, although the cloth is not yet cut.⁵⁸ Statutes exempting carpeting and manufactured cloth from execution are construed to include cloth not manufactured by the debtor's family, but necessary for their use.⁵⁹ A statute exempting "all sheep, to the number of ten, with their fleeces and the yarn or cloth manufactured from the same," exempts the wool belonging to a debtor, or the yarn or cloth manufactured therefrom, although he does not own the sheep from which the wool was taken.⁶⁰

A statute exempting "all the spun yarn and manufactured cloth . . . manufactured by the family necessary for the use of the family" exempts cloth which a debtor has had manufactured outside the family from yarn purchased by him for the purpose, and is not restricted to cloth manufactured by the family.⁶¹

§ 53. — Ornaments and Jewelry

Although the rule is not followed in all jurisdictions, as a general rule any article of ornament, if worn in good faith, is exempt as wearing apparel.

Even in the absence of a statute granting an exemption to wearing apparel, the common-law exemption of wearing apparel, see supra § 52, has been held to include what is reasonably proper and customary in the debtor's community in the way of ornament.⁶² Although there is authority for the view that any article of ornament, if worn in good faith and not in fraud of creditors, is exempt under a statute exempting "wearing apparel,"⁶³ as, for example, a ring,⁶⁴ or a diamond shirt stud,⁶⁵ or a gold watch and chain,⁶⁶ in other states, under similar statutes, the value of the article claimed has a bearing on the question,⁶⁷ while in still other jurisdictions, under statutes of this kind, notwithstanding there is no restriction to "necessary wearing apparel," such articles have been held not to be exempt,⁶⁸ as, for example, a watch and chain.⁶⁹

Under statutes exempting "necessary wearing apparel," articles generally classed as ornaments are not exempt,⁷⁰ as, for example, a diamond ring,⁷¹ diamond earrings,⁷² a breastpin,⁷³ or a watch,⁷⁴ unless the character of their use,⁷⁵ or their being, together with other articles claimed, within the statutory limit of value,⁷⁶ brings them within the spirit, if not the letter, of the law. It has also been held that watches are so generally worn and considered necessities by persons of every financial condition that, under a liberal construction of the statute, it is reasonable to presume that the legislature intended to include them as necessary wearing apparel.⁷⁷

Under statutes exempting "wearing apparel" without qualification, which are construed as applying only to such wearing apparel as is necessary, even if one watch can be regarded as part of a debtor's wearing apparel, two watches cannot be so regarded.⁷⁸

§ 54. Work Animals, Vehicles, and Harness

- b. Vehicles and harness

a. Animals

Under some statutes work animals used by particular classes of persons are exempt, and the courts have liberally construed such statutes for the benefit of the persons entitled thereto.

Span of horses

(1) An exemption of a span of horses was held to apply only to one engaged in agricultural pursuits, and not to a contractor, even though he

ing the exemption, however, in some instances to heads of families or householders.⁸⁰ Mules are also sometimes specifically exempted.⁸¹ For the benefit of those who are entitled, the courts have liberally construed the terms of the statutes as to the property exempt.⁸² A debtor is confined to the number of horses exempted by statute to him⁸³ or to his family.⁸⁴

Animals as exempt tools or implements see supra § 46.

Oxen. A statute exempting a "yoke of oxen or steers" may exempt a single ox or steer.⁸⁵ An exemption of a yoke of oxen does not necessarily imply cattle already broken to work.⁸⁶ A bull, if used for work, may be within an exemption of oxen or of working cattle.⁸⁷ An exemption of a fixed number of yoke of work cattle and their yokes, however, does not include horses and their harness,⁸⁸ or a truck used in hauling logs in view of another exemption provision relating to logging.^{88.5} Under a statute which exempts one yoke of oxen to the debtor, the fact that the debtor has an interest in another yoke of oxen which he has sold to another by a conditional sale does not prevent him from holding exempt the yoke remaining to him.⁸⁹

Teams. The term "team," as used in an exemption statute, has been construed to mean one horse or more as the case may be, together with the harness and the vehicle which is customarily attached for use,⁹⁰ and it has been held to apply to a horse not used in connection with a vehicle or harness.⁹¹ A "team" may include a team of oxen as well as a team of horses.⁹² Moreover a wagon alone may be exempt as part of the team.⁹³ Under a statute

(1) Some of the statutes exempt a span or pair of horses. A "span of horses" consists of two animals which may be connected together or united for the purpose of constituting a team, and a mare and her colt are not a span so as to render the colt exempt under such statute.

Wis.—Ames v. Martin, 6 Wis. 361, 70 Am.D. 468.

(2) Statute exempting, among other things, "span of horses," from compulsory process, intends exemption of team or span of horses, meaning two horses, and gives debtor right, if statute applies to his classification, to claim as exempt one or other or both of such span of horses.

exempting "a team consisting of not more than two horses," two horses, to be exempt, need not be driven together,⁹⁴ but an unbroken colt which has never been used is not exempt as part of a team under the statute.⁹⁵

b. Vehicles and Harness

- (1) In general
- (2) Motor vehicles

(1) In General

Under statutes so providing, wagons and carts, together with the necessary harness, used by a debtor in his business or occupation are exempt.

In many states there are provisions in the exemption laws expressly exempting particular kinds of vehicles used by a debtor in his business or occupation. The word "wagon" has been construed in some jurisdictions to mean any four-wheeled vehicle,⁹⁶ whether covered or placed on springs, or for whatever use it may be employed, in the transportation of either persons or goods, or both;⁹⁷ but it has also been held that correct interpretation confines the term to a vehicle which is suitable for the transportation of goods.⁹⁸ The exemption has also been limited to such vehicles as are used primarily for the transportation of goods, and is not extended to vehicles designed primarily for other purposes, and only incidentally to the transportation of goods.⁹⁹ In some jurisdictions the statute requires that the wagon, to be exempt, must be part of the debtor's team.¹

"Cart" ordinarily means a two-wheeled vehicle, but under the rule requiring a liberal construction of exemption laws it has been held to include a large wagon with four wheels, when used for the same purpose for which the two-wheeled vehicle is ordinarily used.²

Harness has been held not exempt unless so provided by statute.³ Under a statute granting exemption to two horses or two mules and their harness, the debtor is not entitled to an exemption of more harness than will equip two such animals.⁴ The word "harness" as used in such a statute has sufficient flexibility to include saddles and similar equipment.⁵

The exemption of vehicle and harness as necessary for the enjoyment of an exempt horse is discussed infra § 57, and the exemption of wagons and harness as tools and implements supra § 46. Persons entitled to privilege are considered supra §§ 11-25.

(2) Motor Vehicles

Where the exemption statute expressly or impliedly so provides, an automobile or other motor vehicle may be exempt.

In the absence of a statute so providing, an automobile used by the debtor in his business or occupation is not exempt,⁶ and likewise exemption is denied under the express terms of some statutes to automobiles and other motor vehicles.⁷ Where, however, a statute either expressly or impliedly so provides, an automobile or other motor vehicle may be exempt.⁸

Car and trailer

Where bankrupt earned livelihood by working in harvest fields and doing odd jobs in the back country, automobile house trailer in which he and his family lived was exempt under Oregon laws as being necessary as a means of transportation in enabling bankrupt to carry on his trade or occupation, under evidence indicating that total value of trailer and automobile used to draw it did not exceed four hundred dollars.

U.S.—In re Williams, D.C.Or., 24 F. Supp. 440.

"Pick-up truck" was not exempt to widow and minor child as an "implement of husbandry," but was exempt as an "automobile," even though on occasion it might be used for hauling.

In some jurisdictions it has been held that an automobile is not exempt within a statute exempting a wagon,⁹ under a statute specifically relating to horse drawn vehicles,¹⁰ or under a statute exempting a team¹¹ or work cattle;^{11.5} but it has been held that a motor vehicle serving the purpose of a wagon is included within the term "wagon."¹² An automobile has been held to be exempt under statutes exempting a carriage¹³ or a "wagon or other vehicle."¹⁴

In some jurisdictions an exemption of one horse, with vehicle and harness, or other equipments, is held to include an automobile,¹⁵ but in other jurisdictions such an exemption is held not to include an automobile.¹⁶ A statute providing that two horses and one wagon are exempt from forced sale has been held to exempt a truck and trailer,^{16.5} and even two trailers have been held exempt.^{16.10} An automobile has also been held to be exempt under a statute exempting "tools, team, and implements used for purpose of carrying on business."¹⁷ Under a statutory exemption of a team and wagon or other vehicle, the debtor is not entitled to an exemption of a wagon, truck, and automobile,¹⁸ and, if the debtor claims a team and harness exempt, an automobile is not also exempt.¹⁹

Tools and implements. In some jurisdictions an automobile has been held not to be exempt under a statute exempting necessary tools and implements of trade,²⁰ but in other jurisdictions it has been held "At the time of the enactment of the statute . . . the automobile was neither known nor even anticipated in the dreams of the layman or most fanciful and resourceful lawmaker. And although statutes couched in general terms, creating rights and liabilities in respect to known and existing facts and conditions, are often construed to apply to and embrace somewhat dissimilar yet analogous facts or conditions subsequently arising and coming into bearing . . . we discover no sufficient basis for the conclusion that the automobile is so related in character and general use to the wagon as to come within the exemption purposes of this statute."

that an automobile or motor vehicle may be exempt as a tool or implement,²¹ or as a necessary tool and instrument,²² used in trade within the meaning of the exemption statute. The fact that the debtor is engaged in several enterprises from the combined operations of which he gains his living does not deprive him of his right to the exemption of a motor truck used in one of the enterprises.²³

It has been stated that the general test which should be applied is whether the motor vehicle is such a tool or instrument as is recognized as being necessary in the exercise of the general calling, trade, or profession in which the individual is engaged, and by which he makes his living.^{23.5}

§ 55. — Use and Necessity

Where a statute so requires, the vehicle or animal to be exempt must be used for a particular use, and under some statutes it must be necessary to the debtor's business or occupation.

When a statute exempts a particular animal, vehicle, or team absolutely, and without restriction as family, shall be exempt from execution.

to persons engaged in any particular occupation, or as to the use, any person owning such property may claim it as exempt, whatever the purpose for which he uses it.²⁴ Where, however, the statute exempts animals or vehicles used for a particular purpose, to be entitled to the exemption the use of the property by the debtor must have been such as to come within the terms of the statute.²⁵ Where exemption of a horse as a work horse is sought, in the absence of statutory requirements the horse need not be used in a particular form of service, as with a plow or cart. debtor for the purpose of earning a living for himself and his family, and in such a case such use has been held necessary,³² but it has also been held that the use need not be required or necessary to enable the person to earn his living and that it is enough if the person actually does use the property for the purpose for which the exemption is granted.^{32.5} Sometimes this condition has been implied when not expressed,³³ but not under statutes giving exemptions in absolute terms, where possession alone, independent of the use of the article, is sufficient ground on which to base the debtor's claim for exemption.³⁴ "Use to support family" in a statute exempting oxen or horses, "used by the debtor in obtaining the support for his family," is a general requirement and restricted to no particular mode of use. The requirement is met where the team is hired to others for a compensation which goes into the general fund to support the family, as well as where the debtor personally uses it, but a team kept for pleasure merely is not within either the letter or the spirit of the statute.³⁵

When the statute exempts the property only when used for work, or for teaming, or to earn a living, etc., it is not necessary that it shall be used exclusively for this purpose. Occasional use for other purposes, therefore, will not defeat the right of exemption.³⁶

It is not necessary, under such requirements, that the property shall be used for the specified purpose at the very time when it is levied on and claimed as exempt.³⁷ An honest intention to devote the property to such use within a reasonable time is sufficient.³⁸ The application to the use, however, must be intended within a reasonable time of the levy. A possible application at some indefinite and uncertain time in the future is not sufficient,³⁹ and where there is no evidence of an intention to use them the animal will not be exempt.⁴⁰ On the other hand, where the use of the animal or vehicle at the time of levy is such as to render it exempt, the fact that it was originally purchased for a nonexempt use is immaterial.⁴¹

Necessity. The proper test, under a statute providing for the exemption of any automobile used or kept for the purpose of carrying on the debtor's trade or business, is whether an automobile is necessary for the owner to pursue successfully his vocation.⁴² Where the statute requires that the work animals or vehicle shall be necessary to the debtor, it does not mean that they must be indispensable, it being sufficient if they are reasonably necessary, convenient, or suitable.⁴³ Where the owner would find it impossible or impracticable to do his work without the aid of the conveyance, whether that aid is invoked after he arrives at his place of operation or whether he requires it in transporting himself thereto, the automobile is exempt.⁴⁴

Transportation

The phrase "by use of which he habitually earns living" includes use to transport laborer to his place of employment where he can work for the earnings that supply the living for himself and the family he heads; and where automobile was used habitually by judgment debtor as a conveyance to his place of work, which was a mile and a quarter from his home, said automobile was exempt from execution even though debtor lived on bus line which passed his place of employment and could have conveniently ridden bus to work, since the questions of the balance of convenience and economic necessity are not important.

§ 56. Property in Lieu of Specific Exemptions

Under some statutes the exemptionist may select other property, to a particular value, in lieu of property specifically exempt.

In the absence of a provision in the statute other property cannot be selected in lieu of property specifically exempted.⁴⁵ A statute which gives the debtor the right to exempt other property in lieu of articles specifically exempt gives the debtor the right to select any articles, provided his whole exemption does not exceed in value the statutory limit.⁴⁶ As long as the statutory limit is not exceeded, the exemptionist may select some articles from those as to which he is entitled to a specific exemption, and select other articles as to which he is not entitled to a specific exemption.⁴⁷

It is not necessary that he should own any of the articles specifically exempt under the statute in order to claim the benefits of other exemptions in lieu thereof.⁴⁸ Accordingly, a debtor who owns only a portion of such articles may select such portion as exempt, and, in addition thereto, any other property which, together with such portion, will not exceed the sum specified in the statute.⁴⁹ However, he must own the property which he claims, and he must own it at the time it is so claimed.⁵⁰

In the absence of other statutory restriction,⁵¹ statutes giving a debtor a right to select "other property" in lieu of property specifically exempted have been held to exempt money,⁵² and the right to the money exemption under an "other property" statute is not curtailed by a statute in the same jurisdiction providing in express terms for a money exemption in a particular case.⁵³ A debtor entitled to a money exemption out of a fund in the hands of his assignee for the benefit of creditors is restricted to money which he owned or in which he had an interest at the time of the assignment, or at the farthest, to the proceeds for which the property was sold. The claim cannot be extended to money made by the assignee's care, management, and use of the assigned property.⁵⁴ The debtor may claim his exemption out of the rents and profits of a life estate appraised at less than the statutory amount.⁵⁵

Statutes in some jurisdictions exempt other personal property in lieu of provisions and provender not on hand. Under these statutes it is held that a debtor is restricted to an exemption in personal property in his possession and not seized.⁵⁶ Unless he has no other personal property which can be claimed,⁵⁷ he is not entitled to an exemption in personal property which has been seized on execution. Under this rule in order to defeat a claim of exemption in lieu of necessary provisions for the debtor and his family, the debtor must have in his possession property which he can use in order to obtain the necessary provisions. It is not enough to show that he has recovered a judgment for money of an amount sufficient for such purpose.⁵⁸ Improvements erected by a debtor on the land of his wife are not personal property which may be set apart by the debtor as exempt in lieu of provisions and provender not on hand.⁵⁹

Intangible property

Under Illinois exemption statute providing that debtor's exemption, if not selected from household furniture, may in the alternative be taken from other property, selection of exempt property was not intended to be limited to tangible property, and may include intangible property.

Under a statute providing that a husband and wife, living together, and not the owners of a homestead, may in lieu thereof hold exempt from levy and sale real and personal property, to be selected by them not exceeding a certain sum in value, the exemptions should be selected, and received in the form of personal property, at values fixed by appraisement, and it is not proper, when a selection of exempt articles is not rendered impossible by reason of liens, to allow an exemption of the statutory limit in money on sale of the personal property.⁶⁰

§ 57. Property Necessary to Enjoyment of Exempt Property

Property necessary to the enjoyment of exempt property has also been held to be exempt.

It has been held that property essential to the beneficial enjoyment of property specifically exempted is also exempt.⁶¹ There is authority for holding a rope,⁶² a saddle and bridle,⁶³ and even a wagon and harness⁶⁴ exempt as necessary to the enjoyment of an exempt horse. Where the exemption of a horse is held to carry with it by implication the exemption of other articles necessary to its enjoyment, it is sufficient if they are reasonably necessary and convenient. It is not required that they should be indispensable.⁶⁵

A statute exempting "beasts of the plow" has been held not to exempt a wagon or harness,⁶⁶ and, where a statutory or constitutional provision is so far specific as to include the draft animal and wagon, an omission of the harness is a sufficient indication of the legislative intent to preclude its exemption by judicial construction.⁶⁷

3. PROCEEDS AND PRODUCT OF EXEMPT PROPERTY

§ 58. Proceeds

In some jurisdictions where the proceeds of exempt property are invested in land claimed as homestead property, the land is exempt.

In some jurisdictions, where proceeds of exempt property are invested in land claimed as homestead property, the land is exempt.⁶⁸ A combined result of the proceeds of exempt property and the labor of the debtor is not subject to execution,⁶⁹ unless the value of the labor which is not exempt can be separated from the rest.⁷⁰ Under some statutes the proceeds of exempt property are expressly exempted when held in custodia legis.^{70.5}

§ 59. — Sale or Exchange

When exempt property is exchanged for like property, the property received in exchange is exempt, but where exempt property is sold and the proceeds used in the purchase of nonexempt property, or where exempt property is exchanged for nonexempt property, the property so acquired is usually not exempt. On voluntary sale of exempt property, the proceeds are generally held not to be exempt.

When exempt personal property is exchanged for property in kind or like character, the property received in exchange is also exempt.⁷¹ On the other hand, where the debtor voluntarily exchanges property specifically exempted for property that is not

Allotment

In some jurisdictions, under statutes requiring an allotment of exempt property and the recording of a list of the property allotted, the rule is qualified to the extent that the property received in exchange must itself be allotted to the debtor as exempt, in the same way as the original property, the allotment in either case being a necessary condition precedent to the exemption. N.C.—Lloyd v. Durham, 60 N.C. 282.

Part of consideration

The circumstance that the exempt property given in exchange is only a part of the consideration will not affect the debtor's claim to exemption in the property received in ex-

exempt, or sells property specifically exempted, and purchases property that is not exempt, the property so acquired is not exempt.⁷²

This rule does not apply, of course, where a statute does not restrict the exemption to any particular articles, but allows the debtor to claim and select a certain amount of personal property. In such a case where a debtor has selected property as exempt, he may afterward make any use of it he chooses, and anything he may get in exchange for it will be exempt to the amount allowed by the statute.⁷³ Also, where the statute does not exempt specific articles, but exempts money to a certain amount, the rule does not always apply.⁷⁴ Where none of the debtor's exempt property, already set apart to him as exempt, is given in exchange for the property received, but it is purchased on credit, the fact that later payments on account are made out of earnings secured with the use of the purchased property will not make it exempt.⁷⁵

When exempt property is voluntarily sold for money, it is generally held that the money received is not exempt;⁷⁶ nor is a claim for the purchase money exempt;⁷⁷ nor will exemption be allowed in a judgment recovered for exempt property sold voluntarily, even where there is a statute providing that an exemption given in property shall apply also to the judgment recovered for its value when wrongfully seized on execution by a creditor.⁷⁸ Likewise, it has been held that if a debtor mortgages property specifically exempted, and it is sold under the mortgage, leaving a surplus, he cannot claim such surplus as exempt.⁷⁹ A wife who is entitled to her husband's exemption is also bound by this rule, and cannot claim as exempt money received from the sale of property, which itself would have been exempt if she had retained it in her possession.⁸⁰

On the other hand, where the owner of exempt property sells it for money, intending to invest the proceeds in other exempt property of like character, the money under these circumstances is held, in some jurisdictions, to be exempt.⁸¹ This qualifica-change, and he will be entitled to his exemption to the extent that the consideration given represents exempt property.

Agreement as to status

Agreement that proceeds from sale of property claimed as exempt should take the place of the property sold and that sale should be without prejudice to the rights of anybody concerned was binding, and in view of such agreement, court's direction that proceeds be paid to widow and minor daughter of decedent was not objectionable on ground that sale was voluntary on part of widow.

Tex.—Hickman v. Hickman, 234 S.W. 2d 410, 149 Tex. 439.

Personal property

Proceeds of exempt personal property are exempt for reasonable time

tion of the rule, however, is based on the assumption that a reasonable time only is allowed for reinvestment, and that, under the circumstances of the case, the owner could not be expected reasonably to have carried out his declared intention at the time of his application for exemption.⁸² If an unreasonable time for reinvestment has elapsed, the proceeds of the sale will not be exempt.⁸³ The use by the debtor of a portion of the proceeds of the sale of his exempt property to pay debts and to maintain his family does not destroy his right to exemption in the balance which he intends to invest in exempt property.⁸⁴

Where a part of property is set apart as exempt at a certain valuation and afterward the entire property, both exempt and nonexempt, is sold for less than the inventoried value, claimant to the exemption agreeing thereto, it has been held that he is entitled only to his pro rata share of the proceeds.⁸⁵

§ 60. — Involuntary Conversion; Sale on Execution

The proceeds of an involuntary conversion of exempt property are generally held also to be exempt.

As a general rule, if exempt property is converted into property not exempt otherwise than by the voluntary act of the debtor, the other property may be claimed as exempt.⁸⁶ Thus, where exempt property is wrongfully taken from a debtor by proceedings in invitum, as on execution or attachment, or is injured or lost to him through any other wrongful act of another, a judgment recovered by him in an action for the trespass, conversion, or other wrong, or the money collected on such a judgment, is exempt.⁸⁷ The same is true of a judgment under a statute making a creditor liable for evading the exemption by sending his claim out of the state for collection.⁸⁸

The judgment in such a case, or the proceeds thereof, however, will not be exempted indefinitely. The debtor must use the proceeds within a reasonable time to replace the exempt property of which he has been deprived.⁸⁹ The costs of the judgment are also held exempt,⁹⁰ but not the additional⁹¹ or exemplary⁹² damages given over and above the value of the thing converted. Where a debtor's exemption rights exist independently of any selection made by him, and the exempt articles are a part only of a large group of the same kind, it has been held that the debtor is entitled to the proceeds of the sale of those articles in the class which brought the highest price.⁹³

The mere fact that the debtor may have been in financial straits or pressed by his creditors will not avail him as a basis for claiming that a sale to which he consented was involuntary.⁹⁴

§ 61. — Insurance Money

Where exempt property is destroyed by fire, it is generally held that the proceeds of a fire insurance policy thereon are exempt.

Although there is authority to the contrary,⁹⁵ it is very generally held, frequently by virtue of express statutory provision, that, when exempt property is destroyed by fire, the proceeds of a policy of insurance thereon are exempt,⁹⁶ even though the on showing intention to invest them in other exempt personal property.

creditor had a lien on the property destroyed,⁹⁷ unless there is an agreement between the debtor and the creditor that the debtor will insure the property for the benefit of the creditor.⁹⁸

The property, however, must be exempt,⁹⁹ and it must have been exempt at the time it was burned,¹ unless the insurance money is claimed under a statute allowing an exemption in "money and debts."¹⁵ Proceeds of property, which was not exempt at the time it was burned, but which would have been exempt if it had been in existence at the time of suit, are not exempt.² The debtor is not entitled to an exemption of the proceeds of fire insurance on exempt property where he owns and possesses the same character of personal property as that which was destroyed, and all of which was paid for and acquired without anticipating the proceeds of the insurance on the original exempted personality owned by him;³ but he is entitled to an exemption of the proceeds of insurance on specific exempted articles for which he has not later substituted acquired similar ones.⁴

The statute in some states requires a reinvestment, within a reasonable time, of the proceeds of a fire insurance policy, in other property to replace the property destroyed; and the proceeds of the policy within that limit of time are exempt.⁵

Insurance against loss of wages. Under a statute exempting current wages for personal services, the proceeds of a claim under an accident insurance policy for loss of wages by the insured while he was incapacitated by illness cannot be brought within the terms of the statute, and are not exempt even though the wages were exempt and the premiums of the policy were paid from the exempt wages.⁶

Automobile insurance. Under a statute exempting one "carriage" of each family from execution, it has been held that the proceeds from an insurance policy, due for damages to an automobile used as a family conveyance, were also exempt from garnishment.^{6.5}

Where specific property is exempted in order that the debtor may have the product for the support of himself and family, the product also is exempt.

When specific property is exempted in order that the debtor may have the product for the support of himself and family, the product also is exempt.⁷ Sometimes the statute exempts the product in express terms.⁸ Crops, however, are not exempted under a statute exempting provisions because of the fact that they are produced by labor performed under sustenance afforded by exempt provisions.⁹ The natural increase of exempt animals has been held subject to execution for the owner's debts.¹⁰

B. TITLE OR RIGHT TO SUPPORT CLAIM

§ 63. In General

As a general rule title or ownership of the property claimed as exempt must rest in the person claiming the exemption.

As a general rule title or ownership of the property claimed as exempt must rest in the person claiming the exemption,¹¹ although there are statutes which permit the claim to be made by one who is merely in the possession of the property,¹² and a statute has been so construed where it merely exempted certain articles, without expressly requiring title.¹³ Further, possession is prima facie evidence of title sufficient to entitle the one in possession to his exemption.¹⁴ Ownership as between the head of a family and other members of the same family becomes immaterial in the case of household furniture specifically exempt.¹⁵ A purchaser who, under the terms of sale from the vendor, does not acquire title to the property until the purchase price has been paid has still such an interest in it as will support his claim of exemption against any creditor other than the vendor of the property.¹⁶ It is not necessary that claimant should be in actual possession of the property as to which he claims exemption,¹⁷ as possession through an agent is sufficient.¹⁸

Mortgage. The fact that exempt property has been mortgaged will not prevent the debtor from asserting his right of exemption as against persons other than the mortgagee,¹⁹ but, where the property is in the possession of the mortgagee, the mortgagor cannot assert that it is exempt.²⁰

Sale. Where the owner of property sells it to another, he loses his right to exemption in it, as shown infra § 107, unless the contract of sale has been rescinded and the debtor has regained possession.²¹ An intention to sell or exchange property, or negotiations therefor, or even a contract to sell or exchange, does not prevent a debtor from claiming the property as exempt, if there is in fact no consummated sale or exchange.²²

Time of ownership or possession. The requirement that claimant shall be the owner of the property or in possession relates to the date of the seizure.²³ If the claimant is in possession at the date of the seizure, the fact that he is later not in possession becomes immaterial.²⁴

Estoppel. A creditor who attaches a debtor's goods to recover their price is thereby estopped to allege or prove, as a bar to the debtor's claim to exemption, that the goods levied on were consigned by him to defendant for sale, and are therefore not the property of the debtor,²⁵ but the officer who levies on the property as the property of the debtor is not thereby estopped to deny the debtor's title in

§ 64. Joint Ownership

As a general rule a tenant in common is allowed to claim an exemption in his undivided interest in a chattel.

A tenant in common is generally allowed to claim an exemption in his undivided interest in a chattel,²⁷ and by the weight of authority it makes no difference in the application of this rule that the property is of such a nature as to be incapable of division in kind,²⁸ although there is some authority to the contrary.²⁹

Except where statutes provide otherwise,^{29.5} joint property cannot be set aside as exempt as against a joint debt,³⁰ but where a joint execution is issued against two defendants, and levied on the property of one of them, he may claim his exemption.³¹

a. Claim by Partner against Firm Debt

- (1) While partnership continues
- (2) After dissolution

(1) While Partnership Continues

Ordinarily individual partners cannot claim exemptions in the partnership property as against a partnership debt.

According to the weight of authority, individual partners cannot claim exemptions in the partnership property as against a partnership debt.³² However, in some jurisdictions a contrary view prevails and a single member with the consent of the others or all of the members of the firm as individuals have been permitted to claim their exemptions out of the partnership property as against an execution for a partnership debt levied before there has been any division or severance of the property.³³ The majority rule has been rested on various grounds: (1) That partnership property is subject to the payment of partnership debts before all other claims.³⁴ (2) The impracticability³⁵ or even inequity³⁶ of allowing an exemption out of the property. (3) That, under the theory of the civil law that a partnership is an entity,³⁷ a theory not generally recognized by the common law, as shown in Partnership § 67, the partnership property does not belong to the individual partners, but to the firm, that is, to the legal entity.³⁸ (4) That the different exemption statutes contemplate only individuals and have no reference to partnerships.³⁹ Under the minority rule the partner's right to claim an exemption from firm property is not affected by the fact that he is indebted to the firm for money drawn out by him⁴⁰ or that he has individual property sufficient to make up the exemption.⁴¹

Consent of partners. Even under the minority rule one partner cannot without the consent of the others claim exemption from partnership assets leaving the partnership debts unpaid,⁴² although there is authority to the contrary.⁴³ A married woman incapable of contracting as a partner, if she acts as such, contributing to the capital of the firm and being dealt with by the partners as a copartner, is a partner as to them, and may defeat their claim to exemptions out of the firm property by withholding her consent.⁴⁴ A partner who has given his consent may later withdraw it and thereby defeat his partner's claim to exemption out of the firm property,⁴⁵ provided he withdraws his consent before an allotment of the exemption has been made.⁴⁶ Surviving partners cannot claim exemption without the consent of the administrator of a deceased partner,⁴⁷ but the exemption may be set apart to a surviving partner if he has the consent of the administrator of the deceased partner.⁴⁸ The operation of the majority rule cannot be affected by the fact that the other partners do or do not consent to one of the firm having his exemption out of partnership property.⁴⁹

Individual property used by firm. Although an exemption is not allowed out of firm property, the fact that partners use their individual property in the business of the firm does not make it partnership property or prevent them from claiming it as exempt from seizure by partnership creditors.⁵⁰

The claim of a special creditor of a partner, in so far as it depends on the validity of the debtor's claim to exemption out of the partnership property, will not prevail in these states where a partner has no exemption in the partnership property against partnership debts, over the claims of the general creditors.⁵¹

(2) After Dissolution

The doctrine that partners cannot claim exemptions out of the partnership assets is not affected by the mere dissolution of the partnership, but when partnership property loses its character as such before a partnership creditor has acquired a lien thereon a partner may claim exemption.

The doctrine that partners cannot claim exemptions out of the partnership assets is not affected by the mere fact that the firm has been dissolved.⁵² The reason for the rule ceases, however, and with it the rule itself, when partnership property loses its character as such, and is converted into the individual property of the partners, before a partnership creditor has acquired a lien thereon, and if the partnership property is divided by the partners in good faith, before a levy, so as to make it their individual property, each may claim his exemption.⁵³ If one member of the partnership becomes the bona fide owner of the partnership property by sale from his copartners, he may claim his exemption,⁵⁴ although the purchasing partner has not paid the consideration for the conveyance of the others' shares to him,⁵⁵ and even though at the time of the sale it was expected by the parties to it that the purchasing partner would thereafter avail himself of his exemption rights.⁵⁶

necessary to the carrying on of the business of the partnership may not be necessary to the carrying on of the individual partner's trade.⁵⁸ Exemption will not be allowed, however, where partnership property is sold to one of the partners, or divided, after the levy of an execution, for the levy creates a lien which they cannot divest,⁵⁹ and if the execution is thereafter levied on the share allotted to one of the partners, such partner cannot claim his exemption therefrom,⁶⁰ but there is authority to the contrary.⁶¹ Where there is no transfer of the partnership property, but mere abandonment by one partner of his interest, an exemption will not be allowed out of partnership assets to the other partner.⁶²

Insolvency or assignment for creditors. Where the partners make an assignment of the partnership property for the benefit of creditors, and then attempt to make a division of the assets among themselves and to hold them in severalty as exempt against the claims of partnership creditors, their claims to exemption will not be allowed.⁶³ It has been held, however, that the mere insolvency of the firm at the time of the conversion of partnership into individual property by a sale or division between the partners does not affect the right to claim an exemption,⁶⁴ although in some jurisdictions a contrary view prevails.⁶⁵

b. Claim by Partner against Individual Debt

The authorities are conflicting as to the right to claim an exemption out of partnership property as against an individual debt.

Some courts make no distinction between a claim of exemption out of partnership property when the debt is against the partnership property and when it is against an individual debt, and do not allow the exemption even as against an individual debt,⁶⁶ unless the partner's individual interest has been ascertained and segregated;⁶⁷ but other courts take the contrary view,⁶⁸ and it has been held that unless it is expressly and distinctly alleged that the debt is a partnership debt, the exemption will be allowed.⁶⁹

The partner is entitled to his exemption in the partnership property as against an individual debt, even though the debt is due by him to his partner,⁷⁰ and as against an individual debt a partner may have his exemption out of his share of the partnership property after an action for the dissolution of the firm has been brought against him by his copartner.⁷¹ The taking of charge of property by a receiver for the purpose of winding up a copartnership estate is not a seizure or a threatened seizure for the payment of the individual debts of the copartners which justifies one of them in making a claim of exemption.⁷²

c. Claim of Partnership

Ordinarily a partnership or firm has no right to an exemption as against the enforcement of an execution against firm property for the satisfaction of a judgment against the partnership.

For the reason that the exemption laws contemplate only individuals and have no reference to partnerships, the partnership or firm has no right to an exemption as against the enforcement of an execution against firm property for the satisfaction of a judgment against the partnership.⁷³ There are, however, express statutory provisions in some states allowing a partnership to claim firm property as exempt,⁷⁴ and in some jurisdictions a partnership claim to exemption is allowed in the absence of express statutory provisions.⁷⁵

C. AMOUNT

§ 66. In General

Exemption statutes will be liberally construed with respect to the amount of property exempted, but the debtor's claim cannot exceed the statutory limit.

The exemption laws generally limit the value of the property which a debtor may claim as exempt to a certain sum, or limit the number of particular articles which he may claim, and his claim cannot exceed the statutory limit.⁷⁶ When the exempted property is set aside, the remainder may be sold to pay the ordinary debts of the debtor,^{76.5} but if the whole of the debtor's property is not equal in value to the amount allowed by law none of it can be levied on.⁷⁷

Where there is a question of determining the amount of exemption to which the debtor is entitled, the courts are ever ready to apply the rule that exemption statutes should be liberally construed, whether they are construing a single statutory provision or several provisions together,⁷⁸ but not to the extent of violating the obvious legislative intent.⁷⁹

Where the property is separable, the debtor may select any part that may be detached, and which does not exceed in value the statutory amount.⁸⁰

Alternative exemption. Where the debtor is entitled to claim specific articles in specific amounts in the alternative, he may take his exemption in both, but the aggregate of both must not exceed the maximum mentioned in the statute.⁸¹

Holding property by paying excess. When the statute limits the value of the property that may be claimed as exempt, a debtor cannot select indivisible property exceeding such sum in value⁸² and hold it as exempt on paying the officer the excess.⁸³

Provisions. If the statute does not set out the time for which the exempted provisions are to last, such an amount of provisions is contemplated as will be necessary until the next annual period for laying up provisions.⁸⁴ A statute providing that the exemption is to be in amount sufficient for the current year has been held to mean from harvest to harvest and not the calendar year.⁸⁵ The amount of provisions required to the next harvest is based on the size of the debtor's family,⁸⁶ but "family," as thus used, does not include strangers or boarders lodging with the family,⁸⁷ although it may include the grown children of claimant who have no home elsewhere.⁸⁸

88. Mich.—Stilson v. Gibbs, 18 N. W. 815, 53 Mich. 280.

A statute which exempts without qualification the "provisions on hand for family use" exempts all such provisions regardless of what other property the execution debtor may have,⁸⁹ but the term "necessary provisions" within the meaning of a statute does not necessarily include all the provisions on hand, but only as much as a prudent man would ordinarily keep on hand for home consumption in a family of his size,⁹⁰ although the amount exempt is to be determined regardless of what other property the execution debtor may have.⁹¹

Under some statutes a debtor is entitled to an exemption of personal property of a fixed value in lieu of provisions not on hand,⁹² and under such statutes a debtor cannot claim property as exempt in lieu of provisions if he has other property remaining sufficient to supply the deficiency in bread-stuffs,⁹³ but a superseded judgment, however large, cannot be made to supply the deficiency in bread-stuffs, and its recovery by the debtor will not prevent him from claiming exempt, in lieu of provisions for himself and family, chattels which had been seized.⁹⁴ Where defendant has other property in addition to that seized sufficient for the support of his family for the statutory period, he will not be permitted to dispose of or waste it between the time of seizure and the date of the trial, and then claim his exemption from the property seized.⁹⁵

Where a statute allows an exemption of provisions and fuel for a stated period and also a specific exemption of certain animals or other property in lieu of animals to a fixed amount, the setting apart as exempt of other property in lieu of animals to the statutory amount does not exclude the debtor from his right to provisions and fuel under the statute.⁹⁶

Tools and implements. Under a statute exempting the tools necessary for the debtor's trade, more than one machine of the same kind may be exempt, if personally used by the debtor for carrying on his trade, and reasonably necessary therefor;⁹⁷ and his right in this respect is not affected by another provision exempting generally one machine without reference to the occupation of the debtor, as the latter provision in no way qualifies or restricts the former.⁹⁸

Animals. A provision exempting a horse of a certain value has been held not to include one worth more than that amount,⁹⁹ even though it is the only horse the debtor owns.¹ Under a statute exempting one or two horses not exceeding a certain value a debtor who owns two horses the aggregate value of which does not exceed the statutory limit may hold both;² and where neither is worth the statutory amount, but the aggregate value is in excess, he may claim either,³ but where one is worth more than the statutory amount and the other less, the debtor has no election, the latter only being exempt.⁴ Where a statute exempts specific animals in numero, their number is not doubled when ownership in them is of an undivided half of each.⁵

Automobile. Where a debtor is entitled to the exemption of an automobile, its value is immaterial.⁶ However, a provision exempting an automobile not exceeding a specified value does not include one worth more than that amount.⁷

Fodder. An exemption of fodder for animals, even though the statute exempts a specific amount, has been held to include only such an amount of fodder as is necessary to keep the number of exempt animals which the debtor either has at the time of the levy,⁸ or shows that he has a present bona fide intention and purpose of at once acquiring, so as to need the food for their support.⁹ Where the statute exempts fodder sufficient for a definite period, in the summer months when cattle and sheep are depasturing no such food as the statute contemplates is necessary, and probably none is protected, otherwise so much is exempt as will be necessary for the next foddering season.¹⁰ The period of time for which the exempt fodder is to last begins to run from the levy.¹¹ Where the statute exempts a specified amount of hay or other forage for certain animals, without restriction as to time, the full amount is exempt notwithstanding part of the winter has passed,¹² with the qualification, however, already mentioned, that the debtor has the full statutory number of exempt animals for which this amount of forage is allowed.¹³

§ 67. Computation

In computing the amount of property claimed to be exempt, the property is to be taken at its fair market value.

In computing the amount of property which may be claimed, it has been held, sometimes by virtue of statutory provisions, that the property is to be taken at its fair market value.¹⁴ In the case of choses in action, as notes, accounts, etc., the debt or demand is to be taken at its real value, and is not necessarily to be valued at the amount appearing on the face of the instrument,¹⁵ and the fact that a debt is secured by a lien on personal property worth more than the statutory limit as to value does not affect the right to claim the debt as exempt, for the value of the debt is not increased beyond the amount due by the value of the property on which it is secured.¹⁶

If a debtor, under a statute allowing him to select and hold property as exempt, not exceeding a certain sum in value, selects property that is mortgaged or otherwise encumbered, it has been held that he cannot deduct the amount of the encumbrance in determining its value, but the value must be determined regardless of the mortgage,¹⁷ but there is authority to the contrary under some statutes.¹⁸

§ 68. Double Exemptions

Where the legislative intent is clear, a claimant may be allowed an exemption under two or more provisions of an exemption statute.

A claimant may be allowed an exemption under two or more heads or clauses of the exemption statute,¹⁹ but where, obviously, the legislature intended that a debtor claiming an exemption as a member of one class should not also claim as a member of another class provided for in the statute, the double exemption will not be allowed.²⁰ Where, however, the debtor has a reasonable doubt as to which class he belongs, he may claim both exemptions, although entitled only to one,²¹ and the court cannot require him to elect on which ground he will base his claim.²²

A statute, providing for exemption of household furniture generally in one section, and in another an exception of specific articles of household furniture, gives claimant an option to elect which one he will have, but no right to both.²³

Where a statute provides for exemptions of two classes, fixing the amount in each, and the legislative intent is clear that the debtor shall take both exemptions, one class cannot be set off against the other for the purpose of diminishing the amount of the exemption of that class,²⁴ and, where successive exemptions are granted by successive laws, the object of one being to protect the debtor and the purpose of the other being to protect the debtor's family, the debtor is entitled to exemptions under both statutes.²⁵ However, under some statutes, the absolute exemptions are not dependent on quantity or value, but the additional exemptions to which the debtor is entitled as the head of the family are dependent on value.^{25.5}

§ 69. Successive Claims

A debtor may claim and select his exemption as against successive executions provided he does not thereby have in his possession at any one time more than the amount he is entitled under the statute to hold as exempt.

While a debtor may be allowed exemptions under two or more clauses of a statute, supra § 68, he clearly cannot have more than the amount which is allowed to him in the statute set apart to him at the same time by making several claims,²⁶ but he may claim and select his exemption as against each successive execution, provided he does not thereby have in his possession at any one time more than the amount he is entitled under the statute to hold as exempt,²⁷ although, having made a selection in the same proceeding, he is by such election estopped from subsequently claiming other and different property.²⁸

However, when the property allotted to the debtor under an earlier claim has been consumed in maintaining himself or family, a subsequent exemption may be allowed, to replenish the fund the law permits him to have on hand always for the protection of his family;²⁹ but a disposal of the exempt property under such circumstances as to negative the inference that it was used by debtor in the maintenance of himself and family will operate as an estoppel against a claim for an additional exemption.³⁰

Whenever a claim of exemption may be made against successive executions, it must be made against each execution in order to secure an allowance of the exemption since a claim against one levy may not be effectual as against subsequent levies, as shown infra § 130.

Wages. The exemption of wages is one which is peculiarly proper for recurring claims.³¹ The claim is usually allowed as often as process is served, so long as at the time of the service of the process the exemption does not exceed the statutory limit.³² Under a statute allowing an exemption of wages to a fixed amount on any writ, original, mesne, or judicial, one exemption to the full statutory amount may be allowed on the original writ, and a second exemption also to the full amount on a mesne attachment served later in aid of the original judgment.³³

IV. LIABILITIES AS AGAINST WHICH EXEMPTIONS MAY BE CLAIMED

§ 70. In General

The right of exemption cannot be asserted against an obligation or liability which does not come within the terms of the exemption laws, or which comes within some exception thereto.

Apart from a waiver, express or implied, or of any other act of the debtor depriving him of his right of exemption, as discussed infra §§ 101-118, the general rule is that exempt property cannot be subjected to any claim of a creditor or to a lien.³⁴ However, the right of exemption under particular constitutional or statutory provisions frequently depends on the nature of the liability or obligation on which the judgment sought to be enforced was recovered, as, for example, whether it was based on contract or tort, as discussed infra § 72, the right of exemption being assertable only against judgcreditors, and legislature did not anticipate the fact that creditor might be a deserted wife rearing the debtor's children.

Exception as to liens

Under statute providing that personal property exemptions shall not apply when the debt is secured by lien on such property, the only requisite is that the lien be such as the law generally recognizes as valid; hence the fact that a chattel attempted to be mortgaged by parol is exempt property does not affect the validity of the mortgage.

ments coming within the class contemplated by the exemption provisions.³⁵

Furthermore, the constitutional and statutory provisions under which exemption rights arise frequently except from their operation particular classes of claims or liabilities,³⁶ although, since the exemption laws are liberally construed, as discussed supra § 4, exceptions cannot be read into an exemption statute which are not contained therein.³⁷

Some statutory or constitutional exceptions, although in words broad enough to include personal property exemptions in their operation, have been placed in such a context as to compel their application by the courts to the homestead exemption only.³⁸ On the other hand, statutory or constitutional provisions which, by a strict interpretation of their phrasing, apply to realty only have been construed to apply to personal property exemptions as well.³⁹

§ 71. Constitutionality, Construction, and Operation of Exceptions

An exception to exemption cannot be created by statute in conflict with constitutional provisions as to exemptions. Such exceptions are strictly construed; authorities differ as to whether they operate retroactively.

Statutory provisions creating exceptions to exemption laws have been generally sustained as valid and constitutional.⁴⁰ Such an exception, however, cannot be sustained if it is in conflict with the provisions relating to exemptions contained in the state constitution.⁴¹ Accordingly a statute cannot restrict an exemption allowed by the constitution, see supra § 3, as by excepting particular debts.⁴² However, a constitutional provision excepting certain property from payment of "any debt or liability" is construed to protect the property from statutes intended to create involuntary liens only, and not from statutes providing for liens to be created by the voluntary act of the debtor.⁴³

An exception in an earlier statute will not apply to an exemption under a later statute granting it to debtors absolutely as against all debts.⁴⁴

Retroactive operation. According to the view taken in some jurisdictions, a statute making an exception to the general exemption law is retroactive and affects the debtor's right to an exemption as against a liability for an obligation previously incurred,⁴⁵ except where the statute expressly provides that the exception shall operate only on judgments obtained "from and after the passage of this act."⁴⁶ In other jurisdictions, however, in the absence of such express provision, the exception is held not to operate retroactively.⁴⁷

Strict construction. While, as discussed supra § 4, exemption statutes are liberally construed statutory provisions making an exception to the general exemption laws are strictly construed,⁴⁸ although not so strictly as to render the statute meaningless or nugatory,⁴⁹ or to violate the obvious intention of the legislature;⁵⁰ nor will they be so interpreted as to aid in the perpetration of a fraud.⁵¹

§ 72. Character Based on Contract or Tort

a. In general

b. Determination of character of action

a. In General

The right of exemption under statutes not restricting it to claims of a particular nature may be asserted against judgments for tort. It is otherwise in most cases where the exemption is allowed against judgment obtained on any debt, or any debt contracted, or on contract, express or implied.

Where an exemption statute is general in its terms without restriction as to the nature of the judgment or claim as against which exemptions may be allowed, the right may be asserted as against a judgment for tort,⁵² and in some states exemption is allowed against a judgment for a tort under statutes allowing exemptions as against execution obtained on "any debt," or on "any debt contracted."⁵³ By the weight of authority, however, such statutes, as well as statutes allowing exemptions as against judgments based or founded on contract, express or implied, do not apply as against torts, but are limited to cases of contract.⁵⁴ Where one in committing fraud violates the terms of a contract, and action is brought and judgment secured for the fraud, the judgment is in tort, and exemptions will not be allowed.⁵⁵

Intentional or malicious tort. A statute providing that, in certain cases of intentional or malicious tort, defendant may be arrested and shall not be discharged until he has surrendered his personal property in excess of a fixed amount takes away defendant's exemption above such amount.⁵⁶

In Pennsylvania

(1) It has been held that the word "contract," in statute exempting property from execution issued upon judgment obtained upon a contract, relates to a contract in fact, and does not include relationship artificially raised by law to enforce equities or to compel performance of a legal duty.

Pa.—Fell v. Johnston, 36 A.2d 227, 154 Pa.Super. 470.

(2) Under other authority, the statute applies where the judgments were based on either express or implied contracts.

Particular torts. Under the view that an exemption cannot be claimed as against a liability for tort, it has been held that no exemption can be claimed as against an execution on a judgment in an action of trespass,⁵⁷ detinue,⁵⁸ or trover,⁵⁹ or for conversion,⁶⁰ or in ejectment,⁶¹ or in a statutory action to recover damages against a tenant holding over, based on wrongful detention.⁶² However, a judgment in an ejectment suit brought by a landlord against a tenant, while in form a judgment in an action of trespass and tort, may be an action founded on a contract, and is so where the judgment is entered in accordance with an agreement between the parties, and a tenant has a right to claim his exemption as against a judgment so entered.⁶³

Exemptions will not be allowed against a judgment in an action for negligence,⁶⁴ or for malpractice by a physician or surgeon, if the action brought is in tort,⁶⁵ or in an action on the case for libel and slander,⁶⁶ or in an action for fraud and deceit.⁶⁷ Likewise, a demand for alimony and attorney's fees is, as related to exemptions, a demand in tort and not ex contractu.^{67.5}

A statutory exception to the general exemptions statute, providing that no motor vehicle shall be held

exempt from a judgment for damages occasioned by the use thereof on public highways, does not give the injured person a lien on such vehicle.^{67.10}

A fiduciary who has violated his trust,⁶⁸ or a public officer who is guilty of official misconduct or negligence,⁶⁹ or an executor or administrator who has wasted or who wrongfully withholds the assets of the estate,⁷⁰ cannot have the benefit of the exemption laws.

b. Determination of Character of Action

The nature of an action as in tort or contract is determined by the substance of the pleadings, as distinguished from the form or particular allegations.

Whether an action sounds in tort or in contract must be determined by an examination of the pleadings,⁷¹ and of their substance rather than the form or particular allegations,⁷² or the form of the action;⁷³ but for the action to be considered as one in tort, all the essential elements of such an action must be present, otherwise it will be considered as based on contract.⁷⁴ The fact that a declaration in tort contains allegations of promises incidental to the main cause of action is immaterial.⁷⁵ Conversely, that the complaint contains an allegation that the words were actually malicious could not have the effect of depriving defendant of his personal property exemptions.

of a false representation does not render the action in tort if such allegation is not material.⁷⁶

When the complaint on which judgment has been taken shows unequivocally that the cause of action is in tort, there cannot be an inquiry into the evidence used at the hearing for the purpose of showing that the judgment was taken on the contract, so as to admit a claim for exemption.⁷⁷

Joinder of causes. Where the complaint unites causes of action in tort and contract, defendant is allowed to treat the judgment as one rendered on contract and to claim his exemption.⁷⁸

§ 73. — Bonds and Recognizances in Legal Proceedings

Some cases hold that the character of the liability on a bond or recognizance in a legal proceeding depends on the character of the proceeding; but it has also been held that the liability on a replevin undertaking is contractual.

It has been held in some cases that the character of the liability on a bond or recognizance given in a legal proceeding is determined by the character of the proceeding,⁷⁹ and the liability arises out of tort where, for example, the proceeding is one for unlawful detainer⁸⁰ or replevin.⁸¹ On the other hand, it has been held that liability of the bail on an undertaking of replevin bail is contractual notwithstanding the liability of the principal.⁸²

§ 74. — Bonds of Officers and Fiduciaries

The authorities are not in accord as to whether a liability on the bond of a public officer or fiduciary, growing out of a wrong of the principal, may be asserted against the exemption.

A judgment on the bond of a public officer or fiduciary, although growing out of the wrong of the principal, has been held a liability against which an exemption may be claimed;⁸³ but by other authority, the liability is regarded as in the nature of a liability ex delicto and the right to an exemption is denied.⁸⁴

§ 75. — Breach of Marriage Promise

An action for breach of a marriage promise has been considered to be founded on contract, but also as founded on tort.

An action for a breach of marriage promise is regarded in some jurisdictions as an action founded on contract,⁸⁵ and in others as an action founded on tort.⁸⁶

§ 76. — Waiver of Tort and Suit in Assumpsit

Unless the statute excepts from the exemption claims arising out of a specified tort, the exemption may be asserted against a claim based on a tort where the tort has been waived and judgment recovered in contract.

An exemption right may be asserted as against a judgment on contract notwithstanding the basis of the action is a tort,⁸⁷ as where plaintiff has waived a tort and recovered judgment in assumpsit.⁸⁸ However, under statutes expressly providing that exemptions shall not be allowed as against a debt incurred for property obtained under false pretenses, the fact that the action is in contract in such a case makes no difference.⁸⁹ Such a statute is an exception to the general rule, and is not repealed or affected in any way by a later reenactment in statutory or constitutional form of the general exemption law.⁹⁰

§ 78. — Civil Liability from Criminal Act

Ordinarily, an exemption can be asserted against the judgment in an action in contract, notwithstanding it is based on acts constituting a crime.

Notwithstanding an action of contract is based on an act constituting a crime, an exemption may be allowed against the judgment.⁹¹ However, it has been held that no exemption can be allowed against a claim for the recovery of money misappropriated by a public officer, his act constituting both a tort and a crime.⁹²

§ 79. — Judgments for Fines and Costs

An exemption against demands for any debt contracted is not available against a fine imposed for violation of a criminal statute. Where the exemption statute is general in its terms, there are cases both allowing and disallowing the exemption against such a demand.

Where an exemption statute is general in its terms without restriction as to the nature of the judgment or claim as against which exemptions may be allowed, the right may be asserted as against a judgment for a fine and costs rendered in a criminal prosecution,⁹³ although there is authority to the contrary.⁹⁴ Under a statute conferring an exemption against demands for "any debt contracted," no exemption can be claimed against a fine imposed for a violation of a criminal statute.⁹⁵

The liability of a surety on a bond in a criminal case has been held free of the exemption even though the action be in assumpsit; but such a liability has also been held a debt by contract and hence subject to the exemption.

A judgment on a recognizance in a criminal case has been regarded as not being a judgment on a contract against which a judgment may be allowed,⁹⁶ although the action is in assumpsit.⁹⁷ So, where a statute provides that "there shall be no property exempt from execution for fine and costs for this offense," the surety of the principal is liable for the fine and costs, for the offense of his principal and to the same extent; and the property of the surety for fine and costs is not more exempt than that of his principal.⁹⁸ Under other authority, a judgment in favor of the state on a forfeited bail bond against the sureties is regarded as on a debt by contract against which an exemption may be claimed.⁹⁹

§ 81. Costs and Fees in Civil Actions

The nature of the original proceedings ordinarily determines the right of exemption against a judgment for costs.

The right of defendant to assert an exemption against a judgment for costs is ordinarily held to be determined by the nature of the original proceeding.¹ Where the action is ex contractu, an exemption may be claimed,² while it will ordinarily be denied in actions ex delicto.³

In an action involving construction of the exemption statute in which it was determined that the debtor was entitled to the exemption, the exemption cannot be subjected to the payment of costs.⁴

Action to marshal liens. At least one statute provides that the costs of an action to marshal liens are to be paid by the insolvent debtor up to the time he demands his exemption, and after that time by the judgment creditor.⁵

Unsuccessful plaintiff. A judgment for costs against a plaintiff is by some authorities regarded as always based on an implied contract, whether the action is ex contractu or ex delicto, and hence plaintiff is entitled to claim his exemption.⁶ The other view proceeds on the ground that costs recovered by defendant are not founded on plaintiff's implied promise to pay them, if unsuccessful, but are purely statutory, and as in other cases where the liability is imposed by statute, a claim of exemption will not be allowed.⁷ However, the liability of a surety on a cost bond for an unsuccessful plaintiff is a liability based on the suretyship contract, and in such case the exemption is allowed.⁸

Set-off against joint plaintiffs. Where part of joint plaintiffs are entitled to exemptions, while others are not, the apparent injustice will not prevent defendant from setting off a judgment in his favor for the costs of an appeal against the interests in the judgment of plaintiffs not entitled to an exemption.⁹

Expenses of impounding estrays. Where an ordinance directs the impounding of stray animals and provides that the costs incurred by the officer in impounding the animals may be enforced against their owner, he will not be allowed an exemption in the animals as against such claim, even though they are exempt for other purposes.¹⁰

§ 82. Penalties

A judgment in an action for a statutory penalty is not within an exemption against judgments based on debts contracted or founded on contract.

A judgment in an action for a statutory penalty is based on the wrongful conduct of defendant and on the statute, and may be enforced as against exempt property, where the statute allows the exemption only as against judgments "on debts contracted," or "founded upon contract, express or implied."¹¹

§ 83. Alimony or Maintenance

Under most authorities, a judgment for alimony and counsel fees, or for support and maintenance, is excepted from the exemption, either by express provision in the statutes or by construction thereof.

It has been broadly stated that, in the absence of a statutory exception to the exemption law,¹² or in the absence of a waiver of the exemption,¹³ a judgment for alimony cannot be satisfied out of exempt property of the husband. It has also been held, however, that an alimony judgment, constituting judicial recognition of the husband's duty to support, is excepted from the exemption laws even where there is no specific exception to that effect recited in the statute.^{13.5}

According to the weight of authority, a debtor is not entitled to claim an exemption against a claim or judgment recovered by his wife for alimony and counsel fees, or for support and maintenance of herself and her children,¹⁴ and the court has power

Protection of family

Since purpose of exemption statutes is to protect not only husband but also his family from destitution, such statutes will not, unless contrary intention is clearly shown, be construed to enable husband to claim its benefit against very persons to whom he owes obligation of support and maintenance.

(6) Award of property to wife. Ark.—Stone v. Stone, 67 S.W.2d 189, 188 Ark. 622.

(7) Taking of a judgment on a former judgment and order for the support of minor children did not change the character of the "debt" as not being one growing out of, or founded on, a contract within meaning of statute exempting certain property from execution for any "debt growing out of or founded on a contract."

Ind.—Guard v. Guard, 64 N.E.2d 802, 116 Ind.App. 396.

As "necessaries"

Liability to pay alimony is within the phrase "liability incurred for necessities furnished the insured" within meaning of exception.

Wages

(1) An order for support of divorced wife and child, incorporated in divorce decree, and order of execution on wages for delinquent payments of support, constituted an "order by any court" within exception of the exemption statute, and exemption from execution was properly denied where allowance thereof would interfere with the support order.

Cal.—Avilla v. Avilla, 183 P.2d 668, 81 C.A.2d 210.

(2) A judgment or decree based on order for support of wife or children by husband or father may be enforced by writ of execution attaching his wages or salary in his employer's hands.

Pa.—Commonwealth ex rel. Deutsch v. Deutsch, 31 A.2d 526, 347 Pa. 66.

Trust funds

Where will devised farm to trustee for benefit of testator's son, income of farm in hands of trustee or beneficiary was subject to supplementary proceedings to enforce alimony judgment against son, regardless of whether will created a spendthrift trust or trust for support.

(2) Charter provision exempting pension funds and disability insurance funds of policemen's fund from attachment or garnishment or court process for payment of debt or judgment against beneficiary does not take fund out of reach of process when an alimony judgment is sought to be enforced.

Wis.—Courtney v. Courtney, 29 N.W. 2d 759, 251 Wis. 443.

(3) The provision of the Railroad Retirement Act exempting the annuity or pension fund from attachment was not in aid of delinquent husbands seeking to evade their responsibilities, but was intended solely to relieve the federal authorities, as administrators of the fund, from the annoyance of attachment of pensions or annuities in their hands, payable to railroad employees after retirement.

Pa.—Commonwealth v. Berfield, 51 A.2d 523, 160 Pa.Super. 438.

(4) The money accruing to husband under annuity contract with insurance company was not exempt from wife's claim for alimony under judgment of separation.

In Ohio

(1) It has been held that compensation benefits to which husband was entitled could not be claimed by divorced wife as satisfaction for delinquent alimony payments as wife, whose husband was still living, was not a dependent within meaning of statute providing compensation before payment shall be exempt from all claims of creditors and from any attachment or execution and shall be paid only to the employees or their dependents.

Ohio.—Bruce v. Bruce, 130 N.E.2d 433, 100 Ohio App. 121.

of defendant's earnings after a judgment against him has been returned unsatisfied, that a wife's judgment for alimony against her husband may be enforced against the statutory percentage of the husband's earnings, the inference being that it cannot be enforced against the husband's earnings above the statutory limit.¹⁶

In at least one state there are express statutory provisions prohibiting allowance of exemptions against judgments for alimony or maintenance,¹⁷ and such statutes are held not to be in conflict with, but an exception to, the general exemption law.¹⁸ Such a statute, however, has been held not to extend to, or include, a proceeding instituted for divorce in which child support is adjudged.^{18.5} Likewise, statutes exempting wages and salary from execution except in proceedings for desertion, proceedings against a husband to enforce a support judgment, or proceedings in civil support cases have been held not to eliminate from the exemption an action to recover arrearages due under a separation agreement.^{18.10}

It would seem that a husband may practically secure an exemption for his wages against his wife's execution for alimony by having his wages paid to him in advance, so that there will never be any wages earned in the hands of the employer which can be reached by garnishment. Such an arrangement with reference to exempt property is not a fraud on creditors.¹⁹

Veteran's benefits, in the form of pension, compensation, bonus, etc., are usually considered as not exempt from the claim of a wife for alimony or for support and maintenance of herself or her children.^{19.5}

Fees, costs and disbursements. It has been held that notwithstanding an exemption will not be allowed as against a claim for alimony, it may be allowed as against an allowance for attorney's fees or costs and disbursements in a separation proceeding.²⁰

§ 84. Bastardy Judgment

An order to pay an allowance in a bastardy proceeding is not a debt subject to an exemption, except under statutes creating exemptions against "debt, damages, fine, or amercement."

§ 85. Debts Due Government

Except for such claims due the government as are expressly excepted from the exemption or as do not come within the contemplation of the statute, claims due the government are subject to the right of exemption.

Under some express provisions, exemptions are not allowed as against claims for taxes and certain other claims in favor of the state,²³ as, for example, against sheriffs and other public collectors, or their sureties or personal representatives;²⁴ and in the absence of express provision it has been held or stated that the exemption laws do not apply as against debts due to the state, on the principle that the state is not to be bound by a statute unless expressly named therein.²⁵ In some cases the exemption statute is held not to be applicable because the obligation due the government is considered as not of a nature contemplated by such statute.²⁶

By the weight of authority, however, exemption statutes are regarded as applicable to ordinary debts due to the government or a governmental institution.²⁷ Even in a jurisdiction where by express provision of the statute exemptions in certain de-

It has been held that a state exemption law will not affect the United States unless allowed by the laws of the latter.³⁰ A state statute exempting wages or salary in the hands of an employer has been held unavailable as against the federal government, in view of the fact that it would also be unavailable as against the state.^{30.5} However, under the act of congress adopting generally, for the enforcement of judgments recovered in the federal courts, the remedy by execution as allowed by the laws of the respective states, exemptions may be claimed under the state laws as against execution on a judgment of a federal court in favor of the United States.³¹

- d. Character of claim within exception
- e. Subjection of other exempt property

a. In General

An exception from the right of exemption is ordinarily made in favor of a claim for the purchase price of property.

An exemption is not ordinarily allowed, under the statutes, as against a claim for the purchase price of property sold the debtor, statutes sometimes expressly so providing.³² However, under some statutes no exception is made in favor of such claims,³³ or certain property is excluded from the exception.³⁴ Even a statute granting the purchase-money exception in general terms will have no application to articles for which other statutes expressly and specifically provide an absolute exemption.³⁵

Under the exception in behalf of purchase-money claims, the specific property for which purchase money is due is liable to a judgment therefor, notwithstanding it has been set apart as exempt as against other claims,³⁶ or the debtor has other property sufficient to satisfy the claim.³⁷

Conditional sale. A statute providing for an exception in favor of claims for purchase money applies in the case of a conditional sale.³⁸

b. Persons Entitled to Benefit of Exception

One claiming the benefit of the statutory exception from exemption in an action for the purchase price of property must bring himself clearly within the terms of the statute. The authorities are not in accord as to whether an assignee of the vendor may assert the exception in favor of the purchase price.

A party who claims the benefits of the exception from exemption prescribed by statute in an action brought for the purchase price of property or any part thereof must bring himself clearly within the terms of the statute.^{38,50}

Some authorities hold that an exemption may be claimed as against an assignee of a note given for purchase money,³⁹ while others hold that the assignee takes all the rights of his assignor.⁴⁰

A creditor of the vendor who has brought suit against the vendor and has instituted garnishment proceedings against the purchaser is entitled to an enforcement of the vendor's rights as against the exemption rights of the purchaser.⁴¹

c. Assertion of Lien or Exception against Third Persons

Ordinarily, the exception from exemption in favor of the purchase price is assertable only while the property is in the hands of the purchaser.

The provision for the purchase-money exception adopted in most of the states merely allows the seller of property to subject it to the satisfaction of a judgment for the purchase price while it is in the hands of the purchaser; it does not give a lien so as to bind the property in the hands of one to whom the purchaser may sell it,⁴² or affect priorities between creditors.⁴³

At least one statute expressly provides that the property sold must be in the purchaser's hands.⁴⁴ Property will be considered as in the purchaser's hands within the meaning of such a statute where it has been sold by his trustee in bankruptcy, reserving to the bankrupt the right to assert his claim to exemption against the proceeds of a sale instead of against the specific articles sold.⁴⁵

With respect to the exception from exemption, a judgment on a note given for the purchase price and various other types of claims, such as claims for rent and supplies, or for money lent for the purchase, have been considered in the nature of claims for purchase money.

A judgment on a note given for purchase money is regarded as a claim for purchase money in some

Reason for rule

"The statute does not give a seller of personal property a lien thereon for the purchase price, and no lien attaches thereto until the execution is levied. The assignment of the note . . . did not therefore operate to transfer a lien upon the property to it. The assignee purchased nothing but the note. It does not stand in the relation to appellee of seller, but merely as the owner of a note executed by him. The judgment entered was upon the note, and not in any sense for the purchase price. . . . The original seller received payment of the purchase price from the assignee. The assignor thereafter had no claim against the maker of the note for purchase money."

jurisdictions,⁴⁶ although the note purports to have been given in payment and satisfaction of the claim⁴⁷ or although security has been given;⁴⁸ but the consideration of the note must have been the purchase price of the property.⁴⁹ The exception also extends to a judgment on a bill of exchange drawn for the price of the property and accepted by the debtor.⁵⁰

Where the seller, after having taken the buyer's note and indorsed it, pays a judgment thereon recovered against him and the buyer jointly by his indorsee, an action to recover the money so paid cannot be regarded as for purchase money.⁵¹ On the other hand, it has been held that the negotiation of the note by the sellers without recourse is not a waiver of the exception so as to prevent its application by the sellers after reacquiring the note on the purchaser's default.⁵²

It has been held that the fact that the judgment is only in part for the purchase price, which part is readily ascertainable, does not prevent the application of the exception.⁵³ So, where the creditor takes a judgment for the purchase money and afterward loans the debtor further money and takes another judgment for the amount of the first judgment and the amount of the loan and satisfies the first judgment, the second judgment may be regarded as pro tanto a judgment for purchase money.⁵⁴ On the other hand, it has been held that a statute providing that no exemption shall be allowed as against a judgment for the purchase price will be construed to mean a judgment is exclusively for the purchase money or a part thereof.⁵⁵

The exempt property of a surety on a note given for the purchase price of exempt property cannot be taken under execution on a judgment on the note.⁵⁶

An agreement to assume indebtedness forming part of the consideration of the purchase of property is an obligation contracted for its purchase.⁵⁷

Money loaned to be used in purchasing the property may constitute a part of the "purchase money" of the property.⁵⁸ Where the purchaser makes a chattel mortgage of the property purchased to a third person to raise the money with which to purchase the property, the mortgagee is in the position of the original vendor and may enforce his claim against the exemption.⁵⁹ The fact that the mortgage runs to a third person other than the vendor does not change its character as a purchase-money mortgage.⁶⁰

Advances for supplies in the making of a crop have been regarded as in the nature of purchase money.⁶¹

Advances on growing crops. Where a factor makes advances and takes a statutory lien on the growing crops, such advances are in the nature of purchase money.⁶²

Rents and profits of land. Under some statutes a landlord's lien for rent or for supplies is considered in the nature of purchase money and excepted from the exception as such.⁶³ It is otherwise in a jurisdiction where there is a statute creating a lien ways been a party to the contract . . . after reacquiring the same by payment, he holds it by his original title and not through or under the indorsee; and . . . his previous transfer of the note does not work a waiver of his rights."

Iowa.—Callaway v. Hauser Bros., supra.

Effect of judgment in favor of indorsee

That indorsee of purchase price note obtained judgment against maker before payee performed his obligation as indorser did not preclude payee from exercising rights under statute regarding exemptions.

for rent only on nonexempt property of the tenant.⁶⁴

Rents and profits of land, after their sequestration by institution of a suit to foreclose a vendor's lien and appointment of receiver, stand in the same category as the land itself and are not exempt.⁶⁵

Costs. Wherever a judgment for the purchase price of property is enforceable against the exemption right, costs of the action brought to secure the judgment are also enforceable against the right.⁶⁶

Judgment in tort. A judgment in an action against the debtor for taking personal property with the consent of the owner and converting and disposing of it cannot be regarded as a judgment for purchase money.⁶⁷ Where the seller of personal property brings an action in trover against one not the original purchaser to recover the property or its value, a money judgment therein cannot be regarded as a judgment for purchase money.⁶⁸

Estoppel. The purchaser is estopped to deny the truth of a recital in a judgment by confession that it was for the purchase price. The recital will be taken to apply to the entire judgment, and defendant cannot show that a part of the judgment was given for an individual debt of defendant.⁶⁹

e. Subjection of Other Exempt Property

The exception in favor of a claim for purchase money extends only to the property purchased, which must be identified as such, and not to other exempt property.

The right of the creditor to enforce his claim for the purchase price of property classed as exempt as a rule extends only to the property purchased and not to other exempt property.⁷⁰

There must be an identification of the property purchased to enable the creditor to proceed against it,⁷¹ although substantial identity is said to be sufficient.⁷² However, the identification must be of the actual property purchased, and the exception will not be enforced against property of like nature mixed with it,^{72.5} or against other property of the same kind purchased with the proceeds from the sale or conversion of the original property,⁷³ or exchanged for it.⁷⁴ Under some provisions it has been said that no part of any property, whether it is represented by cash, notes, chattels, or realty, as long as it may be substantially identified, is exempt from sale for the payment of obligations contracted for the purchase price of such property.⁷⁵

§ 87. Rent and Liens for Supplies to Tenant

An exception to the right of exemption may exist in favor of a claim for rent by reason of express statutory provision or by operation of the statutes establishing liens for rent.

Where the common-law proceeding by distress for the recovery of rent has been abolished, as discussed in Landlord and Tenant § 675, a claim for rent is, in the absence of express provisions of the statute, subject to the general rules as to exempt property.⁷⁶ By express provision in the statutes, however, claims for exemptions in personalty are frequently made subordinate to claims for rent;⁷⁷ and,

Exemptions limited to particular exemption

(1) A constitutional provision that exemption from seizure and sale of homestead, work horses, farm products, and farming implements did not apply to debts for rent was held to refer only to specific exemption provided therein and to be without effect on exemptions provided in statute creating lessor's pledge.

except as the lien created by the statute is limited to particular property, or to nonexempt property, or property subject to execution,⁷⁸ or except as it is provided that the statute giving a lien shall not affect the tenant's right of exemption,⁷⁹ the same result is secured in other states by the establishment, under the statute, of landlord's liens, which, although not made in express terms an exception to the exemption law, will, under the operation of the lien statute, have that effect.⁸⁰

It has even been held that the landlord's lien, although existing by force of a statute only, will be enforced against a constitutional exemption in the tenant;⁸¹ but this is so only to the extent that the statute provides a landlord's lien on agricultural products raised on the land,⁸² the land in such case being regarded as such a factor in the production of the crops as to subordinate the title of the tenant to the lien given by the statute for the use of the premises,⁸³ and a statutory lien on other property of the tenant would be subordinate to the tenant's constitutional claim to exemption.⁸⁴ Under other

Equitable lien for advances

Where landlords made advances to tenant for additional stock, supplies, feed, and other operating expenses with understanding that landlords were to be reimbursed, after which profits were to be divided, and trial court, appointing receiver, found that landlords had equitable lien on receivership fund, the tenant could not assert householder's exemption against fund, since trial court's finding was tantamount to determination that landlords' interest was superior to tenant's claim.

statutes and under other constitutional provisions, the landlord's statutory lien on goods other than agricultural products raised on the land is enforced against a tenant's constitutional exemption to the extent that such property enjoyed the protection of the leased premises.⁸⁵

As discussed infra § 106, a lien under a chattel mortgage given by the tenant is superior to the tenant's claim to exemption, and this is also the case under the terms of a lease by which the tenant promises to execute a chattel mortgage on demand of the landlord.⁸⁶

For and against whom exception operates. A landlord's claim for rent as against his tenant's claim for exemption can be enforced only by the landlord,⁸⁷ and against his tenant only.⁸⁸ A creditor of the tenant other than the landlord is not entitled to the landlord's immunity from exemption,⁸⁹ and his wrongful seizure of the exempted articles is none the less wrongful because the landlord afterward enters claim to the proceeds of the sale;⁹⁰ nor do the landlord's rights attach as against a debtor of the tenant so as to deprive the tenant's debtor of the benefit of the exemption provisions.⁹¹

So, statutory provisions in favor of the tenant, giving him an exemption limited in amount as against the landlord's distraint of goods on the premises, confer benefits of which the tenant only can take advantage,⁹² and a third person who owns goods on the leased premises subject to distress cannot claim the tenant's right to exemption.⁹³ Under particular provisions, however, a subtenant has been held entitled to the statutory exemption from distress.⁹⁴

Costs. In some states the landlord's lien extends to and includes the costs of such legal proceedings as are necessary to recover his rent, and, on the grounds given, the landlord's costs in establishing his lien may be enforced against the tenant's exemption.⁹⁵

Effect of attachment. It has been held that, when a tenant, whose property has been attached, has failed to make a selection of the property claimed to be exempt so that it is impossible for the court to say which specific property shall be held under the attachment as against the landlord's lien, it is proper to satisfy the judgment of the attaching creditor out of all the attached property where it appears that there will be sufficient property left to satisfy the landlord's lien.⁹⁶

§ 88. Necessaries in General

Obligations for necessities furnished the debtor are frequently excepted from the exemption; what are necessities within this rule depends on the circumstances of each case.

Under some statutes, debts due for "necessaries" furnished to the debtor or his family may be enforced against property otherwise exempt.⁹⁷ Under others, however, an obligation for necessities is as exempt as other liabilities or debts within the statute.⁹⁸

Theory and construction of statute

(1) Basic theory underlying statute is that a debtor and his family, regardless of the debtor's improvidence, will retain enough money to maintain a basic standard of living in order that the debtor may have a fair chance to remain a productive member of the community, and statute should be liberally construed in order to effectuate this purpose.

(2) Liberal construction of exemption statutes generally see supra § 4.

Effect of disability

As regards application of statute exempting disability insurance from execution, for the head of family the essentials of sustenance for his dependents remain "necessaries" as much when he is disabled as when he is well and employed, since disability does not relieve him of obligation of support, although it may affect the extent to which he can perform it.

98. Veteran's compensation

Estate of minor consisting entirely of compensation awarded by fed-

What may be regarded as "necessaries" within the meaning of such a statute cannot be determined by any arbitrary and inflexible rule,⁹⁹ but depends on the circumstances of each case,¹ and the determination of what is necessary for the use of the debtor's family must be largely left to the discretion of the trial court.^{1.5} The term "common necessities of life," as used in such a statute, means those things which are commonly required by persons for the sustenance of life regardless of their employment or status.^{1.10} The article must be necessary for the debtor's personal support, and that of his family,² as distinguished from that which is necessary for the maintenance of his business,³ or for the support of others than himself and his own family.⁴

Debts for legal services,⁵ medical attendance or service,⁶ farming utensils,⁷ supplies furnished the tenant by the landlord to support the tenant's family,⁸ and supplies for making a crop and cultivating the land⁹ have all been held to be within the exception to the exemption laws. On the other hand, attorney's fees^{3.5} and a gold wrist watch^{9.10} have been held not common necessities of life within the meaning of such statutory exception.

A statute which limits the exception to the exemption law to "necessaries sold" or "work performed in a family as a domestic" is construed to limit the application of the law to articles of the kind usually known as necessities sold and delivered,¹⁰ and to exclude all services other than those expressly mentioned,¹¹ and under such a statute the services of a physician,¹² and rent,¹³ are not within the scope of the statutory exception. An action on a judgment for damages caused by negligence is not an action for necessities.¹⁴

An action on a judgment recovered for necessities has been held entitled to the benefit of the exception attaching to the original claim,¹⁵ although there is authority to the contrary.¹⁶ A judgment in an action on a judgment of another state for necessities is not one recovered for necessities under the statute.¹⁷

Extent of exception. The extent to which the exception interferes with the right of exemption depends on the terms of the statutes involved.¹⁸ In some jurisdictions, as against the debtor's right to exemption for wages the claim for necessities is allowed to reach only a specified percentage of an eral government for death of World War Veteran was not liable for necessities furnished to such minor. Ga.—Earl v. Reynolds, 176 S.E. 91, 49 Ga.App. 510.

Determination solely in judicial proceeding

The question as to what constitutes articles used in the home commonly designated as the necessities of life, within statute permitting attachment of ten percent of wages to pay for such articles, is a mixed "question of law and fact" not to be determined by the plaintiff, by the garnishee, or by the constable, but solely in a judicial proceeding. Effect of amendment to statute

Under amended exemption statute, a debtor is entitled to exemption of five hundred dollars in lieu of homestead for debts incurred for necessities of life in addition to exemption of portion of his earnings, amendment not taking away right of exemption in lieu of homestead where debt sued on was incurred for ne-

amount due the debtor for wages or earnings,¹⁹ or only wages in excess of a certain amount,²⁰ and under such a statute a debt for necessities cannot be enforced against the minimum amount named as exempt.²¹

Liability for alimony as a "necessary" within exception to exemption is discussed supra § 83.

§ 89. Board and Lodging

An obligation for the debtor's board or lodging, or an innkeeper's lien, may be excepted from the right of exemption.

In order that liability for board and lodging escape the exemption, there must be statutory authority for such escape.²² In some jurisdictions the statutes provide that no exemption shall be allowed against a judgment obtained for board,²³ or for board or lodging, or both.^{23.5} The statute may limit the exception to current charges for board, it not being applicable to arrears,²⁴ or it may limit the amount of wages which may be taken on execution for board for a fixed period of time.²⁵ Under the latter statute the judgment must show affirmatively that it was obtained for board for the statutory period or less.²⁶

Under a statute which provides that no exemption of property from attachment shall be allowed on a judgment obtained for board, it is necessary that the suit be brought on a judgment for board, and not merely on a claim for board, in order to secure immunity from exemption under the statute.²⁷ The exemption may be claimed, therefore, in a suit for board under such statute, when wages are attached on original process,²⁸ and the creditor must give the debtor security for damages by reason of a false claim or failure to prosecute his action to judgment.²⁹

For whose board available. The immunity from exemption applies only to a claim for the debtor's board,³⁰ and not for the board of his wife or children.³¹ If the judgment is entered for the board of the debtor and his wife and children, the debtor's exemption will be allowed as against the entire judgment, unless the amount of the debtor's board can be separated from the rest of the judgment, in which case claim for exemption will be denied only as against that part of the judgment which is based on the claim for the debtor's board.³²

Innkeeper's lien. A statute exempting certain property from general execution has been held not to abrogate the common-law lien of an innkeeper.³³ So, the statutory lien of an innkeeper covering personal property and wearing apparel of a guest has been held to attach even though such property would otherwise be exempt.³⁴

22. Order for support of wife and children

Judgment against seaman, which was apparently for board and lodging of daughter of seaman, was not an "order by any court regarding the payment by any seaman of any part of his wages for the support of his wife and minor children" within federal statute providing that prohibition against attachment or arrestment of seaman's wages should not interfere with such an order, since statute referred to orders such as might be made in matrimonial action or by court having jurisdiction to make similar orders, such as domestic relations court of the City of New York.

the immunity of claims for wages from exemption, and where there is either no mechanics' lien law or no establishment by the creditor of a lien under such law where it exists, the debtor's claim for exemption as against such liabilities will be allowed.³⁵

By express provision in some states, exemption cannot be claimed as against a liability for wages or salary due to laborers, mechanics, or employees.³⁶ Under a provision of this kind, a laborer is one who performs manual labor not requiring special knowledge or skill, and a servant is one performing menial service.³⁷ One who performs services requiring professional skill,³⁸ or which are not menial in character,³⁹ is not entitled to the benefits of the exception.

Where payments for services are not in the nature of payments by an employer but rather payments by customers in a business they are not wages within the meaning of the statute,⁴⁰ and where the facts disclose a joint adventure, the profits of which are to be shared by all the coadventurers, no one of them can be said to be in the employ of either of his associates and money due from one to the other under the agreement is not wages within the meaning of the exception.⁴¹

Independent contractors. A person who makes an independent contract to do certain work, and employs laborers to do the manual labor necessary in performance of the contract, is not a laborer, and the money due him under the contract is not within an exception of debts due for clerk's, laborer's, or mechanic's wages.⁴² So, an employee who so far retains the control of the work in hand that he is not subject to the direction of his employer while engaged in it is an independent contractor, and not within the exception.⁴³

A note given for labor does not change the character of the claim, so as to take it out of a statute excepting claims for labor, unless such was the intention of the parties.⁴⁴ However, the labor for which the note is given must be of a character to be included within the statutory exception, and if the note is in fact given for services not within the statute, the fact that it states on its face that it is given "for labor" will not avail to bring it within the exception.⁴⁵ So, under a statute providing that there shall be no exemption in personal property against a judgment for wages, a judgment on a promissory note which recites that it was given for wages, but which was in fact given for something other than wages, is not a judgment for wages within the meaning of the statute.⁴⁶ A judgment of a justice which states that it is for "the wages of a laborer" is sufficient to authorize an officer to levy execution on property otherwise exempt.⁴⁷

Compensation award. An award of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act is not a debt incurred for labor or service within the exception to the exemption statute.⁴⁸

Extent of the exception. Whether a laborer can enforce a claim for his own wages against the wages of his employer, otherwise exempt, depends on the particular statute involved; under some statutes, it is held that no property whatever is exempt from execution for the wages of a laborer or servant,⁴⁹ while under others, a laborer's claim for wages, enforceable against exempt property generally, cannot be enforced against exempt wages earned by his employer.⁵⁰

Garnishment and exemption statutes distinguished

Provision of Garnishment Act creating specific exemption of wages in

Under a statute giving immunity from exemption only to a judgment which does not exceed an amount fixed by statute, an exemption may be claimed against a judgment for wages in excess of the statutory limit, even though the amount actually collected on the judgment is less than the statutory amount.⁵¹

§ 91. Other Exceptions

Other claims, such as the lien of a livery stable keeper, are, under some statutes, excepted from the exemption, but not under others.

In order that other obligations or liens be excepted from the right of exemption, there must be statutory authority.⁵² Thus, while under a statute giving a livery stable keeper a lien on all property coming into his possession, it was held that a lien may be had on exempt property,⁵³ on the other hand, under a statute specifying the particular obligations against which the exemption would not operate, it was held that the lien of a livery stable keeper not coming within the exceptions cannot be enforced against the property set aside as exempt.⁵⁴

A statute exempting benefits due veterans from the claims of creditors does not apply to debts or claims against an incompetent veteran for public assistance for his care, maintenance, or support.^{54.5}

A mechanic's lien has been held to be superior to the debtor's exemption right.⁵⁵

§ 92. Enforcement of Claims under Exceptions

One asserting the protection of an exception to exemption must bring himself clearly within its terms and satisfy any statutory requirements for its enforcement.

A person invoking the protection of an exception to the exemption law must show himself clearly within its terms.⁵⁶

The statute may require personal service of a written demand of the special creditor on the debtor in order that the debtor may comply with the demand and save himself the costs of proceedings against him.⁵⁷

Pleadings. The complaint or declaration should show that plaintiff's claim is within the exception to the exemption law.⁵⁸ If the items within the exception are clearly in excess of the value of the property claimed as exempt, the fact that the account annexed contains other items not within the exception, will be disregarded.⁵⁹

It has been held, however, that, where plaintiff declares on a note a portion only of the consideration of which consists of a demand which would be within the exception, the creditor, by declaring and taking a judgment for the price of the exempt property sold to the debtor, together with other debts, must be deemed to have elected to abandon his claim to follow the specific property, and defendant's claim to exemption will be allowed.⁶⁰ If the claim in the declaration exceeds the statutory allowance and attachment is issued for the excessive amount, this defect may be cured by a judgment entered in the case for an amount not exceeding the statutory allowance.⁶¹

Evidence. Particular evidence has been held not to show the right of the creditor to the benefit of the exception.^{61.5}

favor of person who is head of family and residing with family held exception to Exemptions Act, so that provision of Exemptions Act that no personal property should be exempted from levy where debt or judgment is for wages of laborer or servant has no relation to specific exemption created thereby.

shall show the date of the contract on which it is based, or that it shall show the nature of the claim on which it is founded, as that it is for the purchase price of property, or for a tort, or for necessities, etc., in order that it may be enforced as against exempt property.⁶² Its nature may be ascertained from the pleadings in the action,⁶³ or shown by extrinsic evidence,⁶⁴ if such proof involves no contradiction or variance of matter of record;⁶⁵ and the same rule applies to the record on which the judgment is based.⁶⁶ It is otherwise if the statute requires the judgment, or the record thereof, to show its nature, or the nature of the claim on which it is based.⁶⁷ The failure of the judgment to contain such recitals does not, however, affect the validity of the judgment,⁶⁸ but simply the right of the creditor to enforce it against the debtor's claim for exemption.⁶⁹

In a jurisdiction requiring the recital to be made, a recital which substantially discloses the basis for plaintiff's claim to immunity from exemption will be sufficient;⁷⁰ but where the exception extends to a limited class, the recital must bring the judgment within the restriction,⁷¹ and a reference to the general class of which the limited class is a part is not sufficient.⁷²

Garnishment. Although, as discussed supra this section, the judgment against a debtor need not show the nature of the claim, the nature of post-judgment garnishment proceedings requires that when wages are attached the origin of the claim supporting the attachment be clearly made known,^{72.5} and a determination as to whether the claim is for board or lodging or for the necessities of life must be inserted in the record, since they are the only bases of claim for which wages can be attached.^{72.10}

Execution. There need be no showing or recital in the execution as to the nature of the claim,⁷³ unless there is an express requirement to that effect.⁷⁴ Where there is such requirement, the recital may be made by the court's making the proper indorsement on the execution, and this may be done at a term subsequent to that at which the judgment is rendered.⁷⁵

Sale. A claim for the purchase price of goods which only constitute a part of the stock in trade will not be allowed to interfere with the sale of the entire stock on execution, or to the allowance of plaintiff's claim to exemption. In such case the purchase price of the unpaid goods will be deducted from the proceeds and the exemption will be allowed out of the balance.⁷⁶

Injunction. An injunction is not available to a married woman to prevent payment to the husband of exempt pension allowances without first paying her amounts specified in a separation agreement, where the wife's rights growing out of her marital status have never been determined by judicial decree.⁷⁷

V. TRANSFER OR ENCUMBRANCE BY DEBTOR

§ 93. Right to Transfer in General

In the absence of statutory restrictions, a debtor may alienate exempt property, but he cannot assign the right to claim property as exempt.

The legislature may lawfully restrict the transfer or alienation of any property exempt from forced sale,⁷⁸ but in the absence of such restrictions the debtor may alienate exempt property,⁷⁹ even while the writs of execution are in the hands of the proper officer.⁸⁰

The right to claim property as exempt is a personal privilege which cannot be assigned,⁸¹ but the right to select exempt property may be assigned as an incident to the power to transfer the property.⁸²

Alienation of exempt property in bankruptcy proceedings is considered in Bankruptcy § 506.

§ 94. — Assignment of Earnings

Exempt wages or earnings may be assigned, and the exemption passes to the assignee.

A debtor may assign exempt wages or earnings,⁸³ and his right to have them exempt from seizure for the payment of his debts will pass to his assignee.⁸⁴

§ 95. — Gift or Bequest

A debtor may dispose of his exempt property by gift, or, as a general rule, by will.

A debtor may not only dispose of his exempt property for a valuable consideration, but he may give it away, if he sees fit, not only to his wife or children, but also to strangers, for he has the absolute jus disponendi, in the absence of express restrictions.⁸⁵ As a general rule, he may dispose of such property by will,⁸⁶ but where pension money is exempt only up to the time it is received by the pensioner, see supra § 43, the pensioner cannot dispose of it by will to the exclusion of his creditors.⁸⁷

§ 96. — Mortgage, Pledge, or Other Liens

In the absence of statutory prohibitions or restrictions, a debtor may validly mortgage or pledge exempt property.

Some statutes prohibit the encumbrance of certain exempt property on the grounds of public policy, and mortgages and pledges within the statutory prohibition are void;⁸⁸ but in the absence of such statutory prohibitions or other restrictions imposed by statute, see infra §§ 98, 99, the debtor may validly mortgage or pledge exempt property,⁸⁹ and such mortgages and pledges are not within the rule prohibiting a waiver of the right of exemption by executory agreement, as discussed infra § 103.

As far as pension money is exempt in the different jurisdictions, a pensioner may pledge it to the same extent as he may pledge any other exempt property,⁹⁰ and he may mortgage property which has been purchased with pension moneys and which is exempt for that reason.⁹¹ Such a mortgage is not void as contrary to public policy.⁹²

Waiver of exemption by mortgage or other liens is considered infra § 106.

§ 97. — Sale or Exchange

In the absence of statutory restrictions, a debtor may sell or exchange exempt property; this is true even after the issue or levy of an execution or attachment, if the property is absolutely exempt or a selection has been made.

It is well settled that a debtor, in the absence of express restrictions, has the absolute power to sell or exchange, as he may set fit, property the status of which as exempt property is determined.⁹³ A contrary rule would make the exemption laws operate to the detriment rather than to the benefit of the debtor.⁹⁴

Where no selection is necessary to determine the exempt character of the property, as where the debtor's entire property is less in value than the amount allowed by the statute as exempt, the debtor may sell without first making his selection;⁹⁵ but where specifically exempt items of personal property are transferred in fraud of creditors, together with a larger amount of property which is not exempt by an indivisible or an unapportionable act or instrument of transfer, there must also be a selection on the part of the debtor or some person authorized by him.⁹⁶ Where the status of property as exempt property is restricted to a certain period, a sale of the property at any time, within the statutory period is valid.⁹⁷

A guardian of a debtor may, under court order, sell his exempt property;⁹⁸ and the wife of an absconding debtor may sell it where a statute provides that, when a debtor absconds and leaves his family, such property as is exempt to him shall be exempt in the hands of his wife and children or either of them.⁹⁹

After levy of execution or attachment. If the property is specifically and absolutely exempt, or if it has been selected and set apart, where this is necessary, it may be sold after the issue or levy of an execution or attachment, as no lien is created by an attachment or execution on property that is exempt.¹ So, after property has been set off by the sheriff under the exemption law as exempt from sale on execution, it may be sold by the debtor free from the lien of the execution and judgment.² A sale after execution cannot be made where a selection is necessary and no selection has been made,³ except, perhaps, where all the debtor's property does not exceed the amount which he is entitled to claim.⁴

§ 98. Consent of Wife or Husband

In the absence of statutory provision, the debtor may transfer or encumber exempt property without the consent of the wife or husband. If such requirement is imposed, the debtor's power to alienate and the manner in which the consent must be given are dependent on the terms of the statute.

The consent of the wife or husband, as the case may be, of the debtor is not, in the absence of an express statutory or constitutional requirement, essential to the transfer or encumbrance of exempt personal property.⁵ Where, however, such a requirement is imposed, the debtor's power to alienate is determined by the terms of the statute.⁶

Where the restriction is on the right to mortgage or to give the exempt property as security, a mortgage or pledge without the consent of the wife may be invalid,⁷ but the debtor may make an absolute sale of the property without the wife's consent.⁸

However, a statute making this restriction against mortgaging exempt property does not apply to a mortgage for the purchase price,⁹ particularly under an express statutory exception,¹⁰ even though the mortgage is not executed directly to the vendor,¹¹ or to a renewal of the purchase-price mortgage.¹² Likewise it does not apply to a mortgage which is a renewal of a former mortgage given to secure a debt before the passing of the statute.¹³

A statute requiring the wife's consent as to exempt property does not apply to a sale or mortgage of property which is not exempt,¹⁴ and a sale or mortgage of property which is exempt only in part is void without the consent of the wife only as to the part exempt, and is not void as to that part of the property, sold or mortgaged, which is not exempt.¹⁵ If the statute places the restriction on a part only of the exempt property, the rest is subject to the debtor's power of alienation without the consent of his wife.¹⁶

Where, under the statute, property must be selected by the debtor before it becomes exempt, it has been held that it may be mortgaged or sold by him without the consent of his wife at any time before such selection.¹⁷ Further, where the debtor has several articles of the kind exempted, his act in mortgaging a part of them may be considered as an election to claim his exemption in the others, rendering the consent of his wife unnecessary.¹⁸

It has been held that the restriction applies only to property which is exempt at the time, and not to such as by some contingency may thereafter become exempt.¹⁹ The consent of the wife is not required for the assignment of an insurance policy to the insurance company where the right thus to deal between the insurer and the insured is reserved in the instrument by which the insurance is created.²⁰

Manner of consent. Dependent on the provisions of the statute, a verbal assent may be sufficient²¹ or insufficient.^{21.5} When written assent is necessary, the wife's signature need not be acknowledged;²² but if the signature of the wife is required by statute to be witnessed, a noncompliance with the statute renders the assent ineffective.²³

Abandonment of family. A statute which secures to a deserted wife or family the right of exemption conferred on the head of a family has been held to restrict the power of a husband to dispose of or encumber his exempt property after he has deserted his family,²⁴ but in the absence of such a statute the debtor's abandonment of his wife or family does not prevent him from disposing of the property.²⁵

§ 99. After Suit for Purchase Money

In accordance with statutory provisions, the power of a debtor to alienate property may be restricted after steps have been taken to subject it to the payment of the purchase-money debt.

Where the statute, after declaring that property shall not be exempt from execution issued on a judgment for the purchase money, imposes restrictions on the power of the debtor to alienate property as against such a debt after steps have been taken to subject it, the restriction on the debtor's power to alienate under such circumstances does not become operative until the vendor has complied with the conditions, if any, imposed by the statute.²⁶ Such statutes have been held not to give a lien to the vendor, but merely to preclude a purchaser from the debtor from setting up the absolute right of the debtor to dispose of such property as against the vendor's execution for the purchase money, unless he bought in good faith without notice that the purchase money was unpaid.²⁷

- a. In general
- b. Necessity for perfection of exemption rights

a. In General

As a general rule, the transferee of exempt property may hold it free from the claims of the transferor's creditors.

Although there is some authority to the contrary,²⁸ the general rule is that the transferee of exempt property may hold it free from the claims of the transferor's creditors.²⁹ Accordingly, property which was exempt on execution in the hands of vendor cannot be garnished in the hands of a purchaser by a creditor of the vendor,³⁰ and where a mortgagor, at the time of executing the mortgage, has no property subject to execution, the mortgagee can hold the property against an execution issued against the mortgagor.³¹ The trans-

freee's rights are, however, subject to the lien for the purchase price.³²

The purchaser from the wife of an absconding debtor who has deserted his family has the same right to hold the property purchased, as against attaching creditors of the husband, as though he had purchased directly from the husband, where the statute provides that the wife of an absconding debtor who has left his family may hold exempt the property which was exempt in the absconding husband's hands.³³ The fact that a chattel mortgage on exempt property is ineffectual because of nonconsent of the mortgagor's wife does not deprive the mortgagee from pursuing his statutory remedy on the note given to evidence the debt.³⁴

Assignee of wages. An assignee of exempt wages or earnings takes them free from the claims of the assignor's creditors,³⁵ and free from a claim by the assignor's wife which is asserted under a statute authorizing a claim of exemption by the wife of an absconding debtor.³⁶

Under some, but not all, authorities, the validity of the title of a purchaser of exempt property is dependent on the debtor's having perfected his exemption rights.

The validity of the title of a purchaser of a debtor's exempt property is held to be dependent on the debtor's having performed all the statutory requirements in perfecting his exemption rights, such as claiming the exemption,³⁷ making his selection, where a selection by the debtor is required,³⁸ or making and filing his schedule.³⁹ Where, for instance, the debtor has not made his selection or filed his claim for exemption before or at the time of the transfer, the property, not being exempt in the hands of the debtor, is not exempt in the hands of the transferee.⁴⁰ Where the mortgagor has not claimed an exemption, the mortgagee who is not in possession of the mortgaged property cannot claim an exemption therein, inasmuch as it is the mortgagor's, and not the mortgagee's, interest that is being attached.⁴¹

On the other hand, it has also been held that the right of a purchaser of property to claim an exemption thereof if the vendor could have done so rests on principles of equity and fairness and exists notwithstanding the vendor's failure to file the property schedule and inventory required by statute.^{41.5} Thus, the debtor-vendor's failure to file such statutory inventories and schedules is not fatal to the right of the grantees of his realty to hold it free from judgment liens under the exemption law.^{41.10}

c. Time of Determination

The validity of the purchaser's title depends on the fact of exemption at the time of the sale.

The validity of the purchaser's title to exempt property depends on the fact of exemption at the time of the sale,⁴² and is not affected by a change in the debtor's status after the sale, which would have rendered the property not exempt if the debtor had retained the title;⁴³ nor can the title of the transferee be defeated by a subsequent attempt on the part of the debtor to create a lien, in favor of a creditor, on the exempt property which he had previously conveyed.⁴⁴ An assignee is not entitled to exempt property which was not acquired by the debtor until after the assignment.⁴⁵

VI. WAIVER, FORFEITURE, AND ESTOPPEL TO ASSERT

§ 101. Power to Waive

Ordinarily, and in the absence of constitutional or statutory restrictions, the debtor may waive a right of exemption.

Unless such waiver is against public policy^{45.50} or some constitutional or statutory restriction,^{45.55} it is ordinarily held that, at least at or after the time of the levy, it is within the power of the debtor to waive a right of exemption.⁴⁶ One has a right to waive an exemption in his own favor unless he also holds it for the benefit of others;^{46.5} so, it has been held that the head of a family cannot by his individual act waive an exemption created by the statute for the benefit of the family as a whole.⁴⁷

A waiver of the exemption from forced sale of a burial lot is not permitted, as this would be against good morals and contrary to public policy.⁴⁸ A debtor who may waive his exemptions may withdraw a claim of exemptions at any time before the property is set off to him or paid over to him.⁴⁹ That claimant is a pauper and a charge on the township or county does not prevent him from waiving his right of exemption, or from withdrawing a claim of exemption, so as to allow his property to be taken by his creditors, and in such case the overseers of the poor cannot object.⁵⁰

§ 102. — Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

The power to waive an exemption may be governed or limited by express constitutional or statutory provisions.

Some constitutional or statutory provisions, while permitting a waiver of certain exemptions, render an attempted waiver as to certain other exemptions ineffectual,⁵¹ and under such provisions a general waiver of exemption is inoperative only as to the specific articles named therein,⁵² or debts not within the class excepted,⁵³ but will be valid as to other articles, or their proceeds on sale.⁵⁴ If money is not one of the specific articles named, a waiver will be operative against it, even though it can be easily exchanged for the specific articles named.⁵⁵

In accordance with particular constitutional or statutory provisions, the exemption may be waived before the property is set apart,⁵⁶ and cannot be waived afterward.⁵⁷

A constitutional provision authorizing the legislature to prohibit the encumbering of a homestead has been held by implication to authorize the legislature to prohibit a waiver of a personal property exemption.⁵⁸ On the other hand, a specific denial of the debtor's right to waive an exemption in real property will not be extended to personal property,⁵⁹ even though the exempt personalty is sold and proceeds invested in real property.⁶⁰ A constitutional provision allowing a debtor to waive his exemption does not bind the legislature to provide a remedy by garnishment for the collection of debts as to which exemptions are waived,⁶¹ and a statute declaring that wages of resident laborers for personal services to a fixed amount shall be exempt from garnishment, containing no exception in the case of waiver of exemption by the laborer, does not violate the constitutional provision allowing a debtor to waive his exemptions.⁶² A statute which designates certain properties on which the exemption for reasons of public policy cannot be waived in a note, bond, or other evidence of indebtedness is not invalid as a restraint on the right to waive.⁶³

A statute providing for waiver in a certain class of cases without the consent of the debtor's wife is not affected by other and different requirements contained in other statutes providing for waiver in an entirely different class of cases,⁶⁴ and, as respects the right of a husband and wife to waive exemption of household goods, a statute providing that subsequent sections dealing with homestead exemptions shall not extend to certain cases does not control a preceding section dealing with the exemption of household goods.⁶⁵

to waive, the exemption of his wages from garnishment.⁶⁶ Where a statute requires the dismissal of garnishment proceedings in absolute terms if wages do not exceed a stated amount for a given period of time, a waiver is inoperative, and proceedings must be dismissed under such circumstances notwithstanding the waiver;⁶⁷ nor is such statute unconstitutional by reason of the fact that the state constitution allows a debtor to waive his exemptions, the constitutional provision relating to general exemptions only, or on the ground that it impairs the obligation of contract.⁶⁸

A law prohibiting the waiver of exemptions as to wages is not affected by the terms of a general statute permitting a waiver of exemptions generally,⁶⁹ and the special law relating to wages does not have the effect of a general law prohibiting the waiver of all exemptions.⁷⁰ Under the express provisions of some statutes an exemption to wages may be waived and in lieu thereof an exemption in personal property to a certain amount may be claimed.⁷¹

§ 103. — By Executory Contract

- a. In general
- b. Wages

a. In General

Despite some authority to the contrary, the general rule is that an exemption right cannot be waived by an executory contract.

As a general rule, based on reasons of public policy, a debtor's waiver of his exemption right by stipulation of an executory contract is absolutely void,⁷² but there is some authority to the contrary, based on the ground that a waiver of exemptions, when made at the time the debt is created, is based on the same consideration as that on which rests the liability to pay, and is therefore irrevocable.⁷³ It has been held that, the reason for the rule being based on the existence of a family and the conservation of its means of support, it does not apply to exemptions allowed to an unmarried man, and that a waiver by him by an executory contract is valid and binding;⁷⁴ but the status of the debtor as a married or unmarried man has been held to be immaterial.⁷⁵

A waiver of exceptions contained in an executory agreement is not rendered effectual by the fact that it is under seal.⁷⁶ A bond or undertaking given in legal proceedings cannot operate as a waiver of exemption by the surety as against liability thereon.⁷⁷

A transfer or encumbrance of exempt property, by which a present right is vested, is not regarded as within the reasons for denying the power to waive the right of exemption by executory contract, and such a transaction which waives the right of the debtor to exemption in specific exempt property is valid and enforceable.⁷⁸

As a general rule, an exemption in wages cannot be waived in an executory contract, but it has been held that it may be waived in a note.

The general rule, either under a statute so providing in express terms, or in the absence of statutory provisions, is that an exemption in wages cannot be waived in an executory contract;⁷⁹ and this is true even in a jurisdiction where a waiver by an executory contract is generally permitted.⁸⁰ However, it has also been held that in the absence of a statutory prohibition an exemption as to wages may be waived in a note.⁸¹

§ 104. Persons Who May Waive

Only the person who has the right of exemption, or his authorized agent, can waive it.

Only the person who has the right of exemption, or his authorized agent, can waive it.⁸² Thus, a debtor cannot waive exemptions given to his dependents,⁸³ a wife cannot waive her husband's rights without his authority,⁸⁴ and a husband cannot, without authority, waive his wife's personal exemption.⁸⁵ The husband may, however, waive exemptions on community property to pay community debts.⁸⁶ A debtor's exemption rights in personalty belonging to him may be waived by him without the consent of his wife,⁸⁷ in the absence of statutory requirements,⁸⁸ even where the statute makes necessary the consent of the wife to a waiver of exemption in a homestead.⁸⁹

A garnishee in proceedings to reach wages or any other debt cannot waive the principal defendant's right to claim the same as exempt, and a payment by him, or a judgment by default against him, without a waiver by the principal defendant, cannot impair such right.⁹⁰ In the absence of special authorization, one partner cannot waive exemptions on the individual property of another partner.⁹¹

§ 105. Waiver by Contract

- a. In general
- b. Notes and bonds

a. In General

No particular formality in a waiver by contract is necessary unless required by statute, but the intention to waive must be clearly expressed; and additional consideration is necessary if the waiver is given after the indebtedness has been incurred. The contract can be avoided only by showing fraud or mistake.

When a statute so requires, a contract which waives an exemption must be in writing and subscribed by the debtor,⁹² but in the absence of statutory requirements, no particular formality is essential to a written waiver.⁹³ A waiver of exemptions by contract is to be construed and given operation and effect as in the case of other contracts.⁹⁴ An exemption will be held to be waived

when such is the clear intention of the parties,⁹⁵ but the intention to make a waiver must be clearly expressed.⁹⁶

A mere agreement to turn over specific exempt property to the creditor,⁹⁷ or to a third person to be sold for the creditor,⁹⁸ is not a waiver of the exemption. When a waiver is intended to apply only to a part of the property exempted, it must specify the part to which it is intended to apply; but when it is of all exemptions, or of all claim of exemption, no specification of the property is necessary.⁹⁹ Inasmuch as an attachment execution must recite correctly the judgment on which it is based and its strength is measured by the judgment, if there is no waiver of exemption against the judgment there is none against the attachment.¹

A written agreement by partners that the business should be run by others and that all moneys arising therefrom should be devoted to the debts of the firm, share and share alike, and that the succeeding manager should have authority to replenish the stock, but should deposit the proceeds of the business in a bank, to be paid out ratably to the creditors, is a waiver of the exemption in the assets.²

Consideration. If the waiver is given at the time the debt is contracted, no additional consideration is necessary;³ but an agreement made after an indebtedness has been incurred must be founded on a new consideration to constitute a valid waiver of an exemption.⁴

Under most authorities, a waiver of exemption rights in a note is void. A waiver in a bond secured by mortgage is valid.

As a general rule, a stipulation in a note, in the form of a waiver by the maker of his exemption rights, is held void on grounds of public policy and for the protection of the debtor's family;⁶ but there is other authority, in some jurisdictions under express statutes, to the effect that a waiver of exemption in a promissory note is valid.⁷ A waiver in a promissory note, under such a statute, binds the maker only, and not the indorser.⁸

The waiver, to take effect, must be clear and unambiguous.⁹ A waiver in a usurious note is void and inoperative both against the maker and indorser;¹⁰ but where suit is brought on several notes, one of which only is usurious, and all of which contain waivers, the invalidity of the usurious note will not affect recovery on the valid notes or the enforcement of a waiver contained therein.¹¹ A stipulation in a note for the price of land reciting that the vendor retains a lien on all crops is in substance a mortgage on the crops, and not a waiver of exemption therein, and is valid on that ground.¹²

Bond. A waiver of exemption rights in a bond secured by mortgage is valid.¹³

§ 106. — Mortgage and Other Liens

- a. Mortgage or pledge
- b. Lien for rent
- c. Other liens

a. Mortgage or Pledge

An express waiver of exemption rights may properly be contained in a mortgage thereof, but a mortgage or pledge implies a waiver. A mortgage covering both exempt and nonexempt property operates as a waiver of exemption rights only in case the nonexempt property is insufficient to satisfy the debt. A debtor cannot waive his exemption by giving a mortgage without his wife's consent under statutes requiring such consent.

An express waiver of exemption rights in property may properly be contained in a mortgage thereof;¹⁴ but an express waiver is not necessary, for a mortgage or pledge implies a waiver as to the particular property,¹⁵ and the debtor cannot claim an exemption as against the mortgagee,¹⁶ even

Mortgage of law library

Attorney who executed chattel mortgage on law library and office furniture could not enjoin sale of mortgaged property in satisfaction of mortgage on ground that property was necessary to enable him to earn living, and therefore exempt under statute.

La.—Kay v. Furlow, 152 So. 315, 178 La. 637.

though the statute exempts property from "forced sale under any process of law."¹⁷

A statute prohibiting waiver by contract does not apply to a waiver by mortgage.¹⁸ Under particular statutes, one who obtains a mortgage lien on a certain class of property known to him to be exempt acquires his lien subject to the exemption right,¹⁹ but in the absence of notice the mortgagee acquires a lien free from all exemption claims.²⁰ Likewise, under particular statutory provisions, a mortgage lien given to a merchant for supplies to enable the mortgagor to make a crop is not superior to an exemption on the property set apart as exempt, and the property is not subject to be seized and sold under an execution issued on a foreclosure of the mortgage.²¹

Mortgage covering exempt and nonexempt property. Where a mortgage covers both exempt and nonexempt property, it operates in favor of the mortgagee as a waiver of the mortgagor's rights to the exempt property only in case the nonexempt property is insufficient to satisfy the debt,²² and the creditor must exhaust the nonexempt property before resorting to the exempt property to satisfy his lien,²³ and has a right to have the exempt property applied, only in payment of the unpaid balance, if it exists.²⁴

This rule, however, where it is recognized, is founded on mere equity, and will not be enforced where it would be inequitable to do so, and the right is one which the mortgagor must seasonably assert for himself.²⁵

Consent of wife. As to exempt property, the debtor cannot waive his exemption by giving a mortgage without the consent of his wife under statutes which require the consent of the wife,²⁶ but he may execute a valid chattel mortgage on exempt personal property when his wife joins him.^{26.5} It has been held that, where the debtor has property from which he is entitled to claim his exemption but all of which is not exempt, a mortgage of a part of such property amounts to a waiver of the right to claim exemption therein, or rather an election to claim an exemption in the remaining property, and a mortgage of such property by the debtor without the consent of his wife passes title to the mortgagee free from any later claim of exemption in the property.²⁷

There is a conflict of authority as to whether a waiver of exemption in a lease is valid and binding on the tenant.

In some jurisdictions a waiver of exemption in a lease is held to be executory and not to bind the tenant;²⁸ and it is held not to be a mortgage within a statute making a mortgage lien superior to an exemption claim.²⁹ Other authority is to the effect that such a waiver of an exemption in a lease is valid,³⁰ particularly when expressly authorized by statute,³¹ and it has also been held that such a clause in a lease is in the nature of a mortgage, and does not come within the rule forbidding an executory contract waiving the benefit of the exemption laws.³²

A waiver of exemption rights may be implied from the tenant's acts, such as moving his exempt property into the rented house or apartment.^{32.5}

A stipulation in a lease by an unmarried man, giving his landlord a lien on all his property for rent and waiving all exemptions, is a valid waiver, protection of the family as a reason for the rule not applying.³³ A statute permitting a waiver of exemptions in a lease has been construed to apply only to those exemptions in which the debtor's family has no interest.³⁴

A waiver of exemptions allowed under a landlord and tenant act is restricted thereto, and does not operate as a general waiver of all property exemptions;³⁵ but a waiver in a lease of all "the benefit of all laws or usages exempting any property from distress or executions for rent" applies to any property of the debtor, whether seized on a landlord's warrant or levied on by an execution for rent.³⁶ Exemptions as to property not on leased premises seized on execution under a judgment for rent are waived by a provision in the lease that all personal property upon the premises and for thirty days after removal of the same shall be liable to distress for rent in arrear, and the lessee waives the benefit of any and all law exempting property from levy and sale.³⁷

A stipulation in a lease that the landlord shall pay a lien on the crop for the rent does not operate as a waiver of the tenant's food exemption therein,³⁸ nor is such right of exemption waived by a recital in a note given by a debtor for land that the vendor retains a lien on all crops for the price.³⁹

c. Other Liens

An exemption may be waived by a contract which creates a lien for labor performed or an equitable lien.

One who contracts for work to be performed on exempt property impliedly waives the exemption in favor of a lien for the labor performed.⁴⁰ An agreement to sell property to be paid for by the purchaser in installments, the title to remain in the vendor until all payments are made, is not in contravention of the exemption laws.⁴¹

A debtor may create an equitable lien, as by giving a note charging property with the payment of the debt.⁴² Under an agreement between a mortgagee and the mortgagor that the latter will insure the property for the benefit of the mortgagee, the latter has an equitable lien on the proceeds of the policy, even though the property itself was exempt from forced sale.⁴³

A conveyance of exempt property by the debtor deprives him of his exemption rights therein; but an attempt to sell the property, or a contract of sale which is afterward rescinded, does not affect his rights.

When a debtor conveys exempt property to another, he loses his exemption rights therein,⁴⁴ and cannot thereafter claim the property or the proceeds of a sale thereof on execution as exempt, for he has no title.⁴⁵ The debtor's exemption rights do not revive on his reacquiring title to the property,⁴⁶ but where a debtor, after a judgment has been obtained against him, sells property which was subject to the lien of an execution, he may include it in his schedule and claim it as exempt.⁴⁷

An indiscriminate sale by the debtor of property, some of which is exempt and some not, and a mingling of the proceeds operate as a waiver.⁴⁸ A bona fide intention or attempt to sell or exchange exempt property,⁴⁹ or a contract of sale or exchange which is afterward rescinded,⁵⁰ does not defeat, or in any way prejudice, the debtor's right to claim the property as exempt. A payment of a claim against him by a laborer out of his wages by bill of exchange drawn on his employer operates as a waiver of his right later to claim this sum due him for wages as exempt under the statute.⁵¹

The removal to an auction room of the goods for the purpose of having them sold at auction operates as a waiver of the debtor's exemption in the goods.⁵²

Exemption rights as to the proceeds of exempt property are considered supra §§ 58-61.

§ 108. Waiver by Conduct

Exemption rights may be waived by conduct of the debtor if it clearly and unmistakably shows an intention on his part to do so.

The conduct of the debtor may be such as to imply a waiver of an exemption,⁵³ but the acts relied on must be unequivocal,⁵⁴ and the conduct should be inconsistent with an intention to claim exemptions showing clearly and unmistakably that the debtor intends to waive his rights.⁵⁵ The claim may be waived by an express declaration,⁵⁶ but mere oral declarations of the debtor which tend to show that the debtor does not claim his exemption, but do not express a well defined waiver, are insufficient.⁵⁷

The giving of a delivery bond,⁵⁸ or a bond to dissolve a garnishment,⁵⁹ or receipting for the articles levied on,⁶⁰ even where done voluntarily,⁶¹ will not raise an inference of the debtor's intention to waive his exemption. A selection of other property in lieu of property specifically exempt under the terms of a statute so providing operates as a waiver to claim the articles specifically exempt, and it will have this effect even though the debtor fails in his claim to exemption in the substituted property, with the result that he will lose his entire exemption claim, not merely to the substituted property, but to the property specifically exempt.⁶²

The debtor, by transferring all his other property to creditors to pay debts, does not waive his right to claim garnished property as exempt.⁶³

§ 109. — Consent to Levy

A debtor's consent to a levy precludes him from maintaining an action for a wrongful levy, and has been held to preclude him from asserting the right of exemption and stopping the sale; but there is authority that a claim after levy, but before the sale, should be allowed unless prejudice will result. If the debtor asks the officer to levy on certain property, or expressly agrees to a present sale of the property, he waives his right of exemption therein.

If the debtor consents to a levy by the officer, he cannot afterward maintain an action against him on the ground that the levy was wrongful.⁶⁴ It has been held that the debtor's consent to levy will operate as a waiver of the right of exemption so as to estop the debtor from subsequently claiming such right and stopping a sale;⁶⁵ but other authority is to the effect that a claim after the levy, if made before sale, should be allowed unless prejudice will result.⁶⁶

If the debtor asks the officer to levy on a particular piece of property⁶⁷ in preference to another,⁶⁸ or if the debtor agrees expressly to a present sale of the property,⁶⁹ or to a transfer of the proceeds of exempt property to the creditor,⁷⁰ his right to his exemption in the property concerned is waived; but the giving up of property to an officer is not a waiver of the right of defendant to claim it as exempt in his hands,⁷¹ and an agreement by the debtor that the debtor himself sell specific property and turn the proceeds over to the sheriff to be held subject to order of court until exemption rights are determined does not amount to a waiver of exemption as to the proceeds of the sale.⁷²

If the statute requires the officer to levy in all cases, leaving it for the debtor afterward to claim his exemptions, consent to a levy merely is not a waiver.⁷³ If the debtor's attorney, duly authorized, agrees expressly to the sale,⁷⁴ or delivers up property to the sheriff for sale,⁷⁵ the debtor is bound by his conduct, and is taken to have waived his exemption.

§ 110. — Failure to Assert Claim

The debtor's failure to assert a claim of exemption, or to assert it in the manner required by statute, laches in asserting the claim, or failure to select exempt property when selection is required, is a waiver of the right of exemption, unless a justifiable excuse exists or unless the debtor is under no legal obligation to assert his claim or has no knowledge of the exempt nature of the property.

Unless, under the exemption statutes, it is unnecessary for the debtor to claim an exemption in specific property in order to protect his rights therein,⁷⁶ as a general rule failure to assert or claim a right of exemption at all, or a failure to assert or claim it at the time and in the manner expressly or impliedly required by the statute which confers the right, if any such statutory requirement is made, is a waiver of the right.⁷⁷ The debtor must, however, be under a legal obligation to assert his claim,⁷⁸ and he must have knowledge of the facts on the existence of which the legal obligation rests;⁷⁹ he must also know that the property is exempt.⁸⁰

Failure to plead an exemption may waive it,⁸¹ and an appearance without asserting the claim, in proceedings in which the statute requires that the claim be asserted or otherwise be lost, waives the claim;⁸² but a general appearance by the debtor in the suit against him without at that time claiming his exemption is not an implied waiver of an exemption

as to wages where an express waiver is not permitted.⁸³

The debtor's appearing and moving to dissolve an attachment without first having made claim to his exemption,⁸⁴ or the traverse of an attachment on other grounds before claiming the exemption,⁸⁵ is not a waiver of his right. For an exemption of specific household property to be retained as against a general waiver of homestead rights, the exemption must be set up in the manner prescribed by statute.⁸⁶

The necessity and sufficiency of a claim generally are considered infra §§ 129-135.

Excuses for failure to claim. Failure to make a claim for exemptions may be explained and excused on the ground of unavoidable accident or mistake,⁸⁷ an accident within the meaning of this rule meaning the happening of an event without the concurrence of the will of the person by whose agency it was caused.⁸⁸ Absence at the time of sale on account of sickness in debtor's family is a sufficient excuse for not making the claim, where the creditor is aware of the claim from its having been made in a former suit.⁸⁹ Misinformation received from the officers as to the debtor's rights may be sufficient excuse for the failure of the debtor to make his claim.⁹⁰

Where the debtor's delay to claim his exemption at the proper time is due to the fact that he is absent from the jurisdiction, no waiver can be inferred,⁹¹ unless he knew of the levy, and his absence was avoidable.⁹²

Laches. If the debtor delays unreasonably to assert his claim, so that he may be considered guilty of laches, his right to an exemption will be considered waived.⁹³ Mere lapse of time, when the rights of parties in interest have not been affected, may not of itself be a bar to the exemption claim;⁹⁴ but the court may assess against the debtor the costs which a timely filing of the exemption claims might have avoided.^{94.5}

While a delay in the assertion of the exemption right which goes beyond the time the statute provides it shall be made is laches constituting ground for adjudication that the debtor has waived his right,⁹⁵ if the delay is terminated at any time before the statutory limit, there is no laches on which the creditor can base his claim of waiver.⁹⁶

Failure to select. The rule that failure to assert claim is a waiver of the exemption is applicable where the debtor has to elect from among several articles which he is entitled to hold exempt,⁹⁷ or where he must select the amount of property allowed to him as exempt by the statute, out of a larger stock.⁹⁸

A failure to make selection in such cases is not necessarily a waiver of exemption as matter of law;⁹⁹ the debtor must have had an opportunity to make a selection in order that his failure to select shall constitute a waiver,¹ and his failure to assert his claim to an exemption does not amount to a waiver where the statute requires the officer to make a demand on the debtor to make his selection, and on the debtor's default, to make the selection himself, and it is shown that the officer has failed to make the statutory demand.² A debtor who fails to comply with the statute prescribing the method of selecting property claimed to be exempt from execution waives his right to exemption.³ Where the debtor is present at the sale and makes no objection to the sale of a certain piece of property, his right of exemption is waived.⁴

The necessity and sufficiency of a selection generally are considered infra § 138.

§ 111. Operation and Effect of Waiver

- a. In general
- b. Operation as lien or pledge
- c. Waiver by husband as affecting wife and family
- d. Waiver by partner

a. In General

A waiver places the exempt property in the same position as nonexempt property, as against the creditor in whose favor the exemption is waived; and an implied waiver has the same effect as an express waiver. A waiver will not be extended beyond its ordinary meaning as to the property included, and a waiver in a lease extends no further than for the rent due.

If a debtor is authorized, expressly or impliedly, to waive his exemptions, a waiver places the property in the same situation as nonexempt property as against the particular creditor in whose favor the exemption has been waived,⁵ and, although a waiver does not give a right and title to the property,⁶ after a waiver the debtor has no right to interfere with the subjugation of the property to the payment of the debt.⁷

A waiver implied from the debtor's acts or omissions has the same legal effect as an express waiver,⁸ and creditors whose claim is based on an express waiver of the debtor have no preference over those whose claim is based on an implied waiver.⁹

A waiver will not be extended beyond its ordinary meaning as to the property included,¹⁰ and a waiver of exemptions as to certain property only cannot operate as a waiver as to any other property.¹¹ A waiver of exemptions as to personal property covers property treated by its owner as personal property.¹² When a waiver of all exemptions, incorporated in a note as a part of the consideration, is not expressly limited to property then owned by the debtor, it applies equally to property afterward acquired by him.¹³

A waiver of exemptions will be construed as having reference to exemptions under laws of the state where the waiver is made, in the absence of any reference therein to the laws of other states.¹⁴ If an agreement to submit to arbitration is accompanied by a bond containing a waiver of exemption, the waiver follows and attaches to a judgment obtained in default of abiding by the award.¹⁵

Waiver in lease. The waiver of exemption in a written lease subjects, where such waiver is allowed, the exempt property of the tenant to the satisfaction of a judgment for the rent.¹⁶ Where the waiver in the lease is restricted to exemptions in property on the premises, the tenant's exemption in property not in the premises is unaffected.¹⁷ Where the waiving clause stipulates that all property on the premises shall be liable to distress and that all right of exemption shall be waived, the waiver is construed to have reference only to all exemptions in property on the premises, and not to extend to other property not on the premises.¹⁸ and to apply only to proceedings for the recovery of rent by distress,¹⁹ and not to apply generally to debts for rent without regard to the process used in collecting them.²⁰

The waiver extends no further than for the rent due, and the tenant is entitled, on the sale of the goods for the rent, to his exemption in the surplus proceeds of the sale over and above the amount of the claim for rent then due, as against an attachment by the landlord to hold such surplus for subsequently accruing rent.²¹ A landlord, by taking in payment of rent notes containing a waiver of exemption of personal property, does not thereby abandon the landlord's lien.²²

b. Operation as Lien or Pledge

A waiver of exemption does not operate as a lien or pledge on any property.

A waiver of exemption creates no lien on any property.²³ Thus, waiver by failure of a tenant to plead the exemption in a proceeding by the landlord will not impress a landlord's lien on the property.²⁴

Likewise, a waiver of exemptions in a promissory note does not amount to a lien or pledge of any of the debtor's exempt property or confer any estate or interest in it, but there must be a judgment and execution to give the waiver any operation;²⁵ and so a waiver of exemptions in a promissory note does not affect the promisor's right to insure his life for the benefit of his wife, paying annual premiums not in excess of the statutory limit, and the creditor, after reducing his debt to judgment, cannot reach and subject in equity property which the surviving wife has bought or improved with the proceeds of the policy.²⁶

If the exemption is waived in a judgment, the debtor cannot divest his property from liability under the judgment by transferring it to his wife.²⁷

c. Waiver by Husband as Affecting Wife and Family

A debtor's waiver does not affect exemptions in which his wife or family has an interest; but the wife must intervene to protect her interests.

A husband's waiver, where the right to waive is recognized, binds the wife, in the absence of express restrictions,²⁸ but does not affect exemptions in which his wife or his family has an interest.²⁹ Where the wife has such interest, however, she must intervene to protect her interest, else she also will be taken to have waived her rights, and her husband's waiver under such circumstances will operate to deprive her also of her rights in the exempt property.³⁰

The rights of a married woman in her separate property cannot be affected by an attempted waiver by her husband.³¹

d. Waiver by Partner

A waiver by one partner is good against his individual property, but not against the individual property of other partners unless authorized by them. A partner acting within the scope of his authority may bind his copartners in waiving exemption on the firm's personality.

A waiver by one partner is good against his individual property, but in the absence of special authorization it is not good against the individual property of other partners.³² A waiver of exemptions on the personal property of a partnership executed by one partner within the scope of his authorization and duties is binding on the other partners,³³ and where one partner has authority to mortgage the firm property, the implied waiver in favor of the mortgagee binds the partner not signing the mortgage.³⁴

§ 112. — Rights of Other Creditors

A waiver of exemption for the benefit of a junior judgment creditor works a waiver in favor of all judgment creditors, but a waiver by reason of a mortgage or pledge of exempt property does not result in a waiver of exemption against the claims of other creditors.

It has been held that a waiver of exemption for the benefit of a junior judgment creditor works a waiver in favor of all judgment creditors; the debtor is not allowed to determine priorities by this means.³⁵ Whatever the debtor does not claim for himself or his family goes into the general fund, to be distributed according to law,³⁶ for among creditors having existing liens on the same property, the law, and not the will of the debtor, regulates their priority.³⁷ The rule does not apply to costs.³⁸

In order for the rule to be applied at all, there must be process in the sheriff's hands whereby he can seize all defendant's property and thus take the proceeds into court for distribution before the creditors can take advantage of the waiver.³⁹ Where no debt is levied except the one against which the debtor claims exemption, and there is no fund in court to be distributed, the rule does not apply.⁴⁰

When a debtor waives his right of exemption, a provision of the exemption law that no exemption shall be allowed as against a judgment for the purchase money ceases to have any operation, and such a judgment creditor's rights are inferior to those of a prior creditor.⁴¹

emption therein as against the mortgagee or pledgee, as stated in § 106 supra, no waiver of the exemption results as against the claims of other creditors,⁴² so that a release of the mortgage by the mortgagee to the mortgagor revests the property, exempt from all claims, in the debtor, and is not a diversion of the debtor's assets in fraud of the other creditors;⁴³ and a debtor is entitled to his personal property exemption in an equity of redemption in personal property subject to mortgage.⁴⁴ The debtor may claim exemption against subsequent judgment creditors,⁴⁵ or against general judgment creditors whose liens had attached prior to its execution,⁴⁶ but, if real estate is sold under a judgment prior to a mortgage, defendant is not entitled to claim his exemption out of the proceeds.⁴⁷

A mortgagor of exempt personal property remaining in possession may maintain an action of trespass against an officer for levying on and selling such property.⁴⁸ A mortgagee may, as against an execution creditor of the mortgagor, release from his mortgage property selected by the mortgagor as exempt.⁴⁹ Where the possession of property subject to an unrecorded chattel mortgage is given to the mortgagee, with instruction to sell part of the property to pay the mortgage debt, and the property is afterward attached, and the mortgagee then withdraws his claim, the right of the owner to claim exemption therein is not defeated.⁵⁰

The statutes providing for a levy on mortgaged property do not affect the rule that a mortgage of exempt property operates as a waiver of the right of exemption only in favor of the mortgagee, but it subjects to execution or attachment the interest of a mortgagor in such property only as would have been subject to execution if he had not mortgaged it.⁵¹

Right to surplus. When the statute allows a debtor to claim as exempt property not exceeding a certain sum in value as against levy and sale on execution, a debtor whose property has been sold on foreclosure of a mortgage may claim it out of the surplus proceeds of the sale, as against judgment creditors.⁵² Where the statute exempts specific property only, and does not allow the debtor to claim his exemptions out of property generally, including money, a mortgagor of property so specifically exempted cannot claim his exemption out of the proceeds of a sale on foreclosure of the mortgage.⁵³

Claim less than amount of exemption. When the waiver is in favor of a claim which is less than the amount of the exemption, it does not operate as a complete abandonment of the exemption, and does not prevent a claim of the balance of the exemption as against creditors having subsequent liens.⁵⁴

Resort to exempted fund. It is settled that a waiver of exemptions as to any lien will inure to the benefit of creditors having subsequent liens, so far as to entitle them to compel the creditor in whose favor exemptions have been waived to resort first to the exempted fund;⁵⁵ but this does not mean that a creditor to whom such waiver has been given shall insist on it for the benefit of creditors who have no such waiver.⁵⁶

§ 113. Enforcement of Waiver

A person entitled to the benefit of a waiver may bring action for its enforcement and must plead the waiver; if the statute so requires, the judgment must contain the waiver. A mortgagor is entitled to have the mortgagee's claim satisfied out of nonexempt property, if no loss to the mortgagee is involved.

The person entitled to the benefit of a waiver of exemption may bring an action for its enforcement.⁵⁷ If a waiver by an agreement is claimed in an action thereon, it must be pleaded and found in favor of plaintiff.⁵⁸ The mere allegation of the fact that a waiver has been made and its extent is sufficient;⁵⁹ but an allegation of a waiver of all homestead exemptions does not include personalty.⁶⁰

In accordance with statutory provisions so requiring, the judgment must contain the waiver or it cannot be taken advantage of,⁶¹ and omission of the waiver in the judgment amounts to an abandonment thereof and a consent to accept a common judgment.⁶² In other jurisdictions, where there are no such statutory requirements, it is not necessary that the judgment should contain a recital of the waiver;⁶³ and a waiver, after judgment, is provable aliunde, whether the lien of the judgment is general or special, and whether the waiver is written in the contract or obligation, or on a separate paper.⁶⁴ Where the debtor has waived the benefit of any exemption laws at the time of contracting the debt, the waiver need not be filed at the time of entry of judgment on the debt,⁶⁵ and it is held that a defendant in an execution is not entitled to his exemption, where his promissory note on which the judgment was obtained waives the exemption, although there is no reference in the transcript to the waiver.⁶⁶

Where suit is brought on a note with a waiver of exemption and on the common counts in assumpsit, and it does not appear on what count judgment is entered, plaintiff cannot avail himself of the waiver.⁶⁷

If the waiver has not been pleaded, has not been indorsed on the writ, or has not otherwise appeared in the proceedings as required by law, it cannot appear in the judgment, and if the judgment thus improperly contains a waiver it must be modified by omitting the recital thereof.⁶⁸

Where the statute requires that the fact of waiver shall be indorsed on the writ by the officer issuing it, a complaint containing an averment of waiver, filed on the return of the writ, is not a compliance with the statute, in the absence of the statutory indorsement of waiver on the writ.⁶⁹

Mortgage. Although a mortgage operates as a waiver of mortgagor's exemption rights as against the mortgagee, as stated supra § 106, the mortgagor is entitled as against the mortgagee to a marshaling of the assets after sale, and to have the mortgagee's claim satisfied out of the sale of non-exempt property, if no loss to the mortgagee is involved.⁷⁰ Where there was no stipulation either in the mortgage or in the notes to secure which the mortgage was given, a personal judgment against the mortgagor for recovery of the debt, without relief from valuation or appraisal laws, is erroneous.⁷¹

Waiver by a mortgage covering exempt and non-exempt property is considered supra § 106.

Landlord's claim. Where, by law, the landlord has no lien on the tenant's property exempt from execution, it is necessary for the landlord to record a lease containing a waiver of exemptions if he wishes to claim the waiver against bona fide purchasers of the property.⁷²

§ 114. Revocation and Release of Waiver

A waiver without consideration may be revoked at any time before it is acted on, but a waiver based on consideration is irrevocable. A creditor in whose favor the debtor has waived exemptions may release him from the effect of the waiver.

A consent that exempt property may be levied on and sold may, if not supported by a consideration, be revoked at any time before it is acted on;⁷³ and where a waiver implied from the conduct of defendant is without consideration it is revocable.⁷⁴ Where the waiver is made at the time of entering into a contract, it is based on the same consideration as that on which rests the liability to pay, and is therefore irrevocable.⁷⁵

The death of a debtor, after executing and delivering a judgment note containing a waiver of exemptions, does not revoke the waiver.⁷⁶ There is a revocation in law when a deed of trust operating as a waiver of exemption is set aside by a subsequent adjudication in bankruptcy.⁷⁷

Release of waiver. A creditor in whose favor the debtor has waived exemptions may release him from the effect of the waiver or compromise the claim of exemption.⁷⁸

§ 115. Estoppel to Claim Exemption

Under general principles of estoppel, a debtor may be precluded from setting up a claim that property is exempt, as by acceptance of the proceeds of the sale, failure to claim the exemption, or a denial of ownership of the property.

Under the application of general principles of estoppel, a debtor may be precluded from setting up a claim that property is exempt,⁷⁹ although a mere waiver of his exemption, or an executory contract to waive it, might be invalid.⁸⁰ Any conduct or representations of the debtor which influence a change of acts and position of the creditor or the officer to his detriment may operate as an estoppel.⁸¹

In order that an estoppel may arise, the person claiming the exemption must actually be guilty of conduct or misrepresentations which would reasonably induce the other party to act to his detriment,⁸² and the other party must have acted to his prej-

Permitting car registration in husband's name

Wife was held not estopped from denying validity of mortgage on automobile on ground that automobile was exempt property and mortgage was not joined in by wife, because she permitted husband to have automobile in his name, particularly where, before mortgage loan was made, mortgagee's agent was informed that wife had interest in automobile.

Kan.—Foster v. Foster, 61 P.2d 1350, 144 Kan. 528.

Failure to reply to allegation

The debtor is not estopped from claiming an exemption by failing to reply to an allegation that he had no exemption rights under the law of a foreign state where his rights

udice or changed his position in reliance on such misrepresentations or conduct,⁸³ this constituting the distinction between an estoppel in pais and a waiver.⁸⁴

A statement by the debtor to the mortgagee that the property is not exempt does not estop the debtor from asserting the exemption against a third person.⁸⁵ Where the debtor notifies the sheriff and creditor through his attorney of his claim to exemption, it is not necessary that he should go further and absolutely prevent the sale of the property;⁸⁶ but laches in seeking to set aside an execution sale, although exemption was claimed at the time of the sale but disregarded, may prevent the subsequent assertion of the right of exemption.⁸⁷ Where a debtor, in order to protect the surety on a replevin bond, informs the officer that he will surrender certain exempt property and the officer accepts the offer, the debtor cannot afterward withdraw the surrender by claiming his exemption, since this might subject the officer to suit;⁸⁸ but keeping possession of goods seized on execution as bailee of the sheriff, or buying them in at the execution sale, does not estop the owner from prosecuting his claim to them as exempt from execution.⁸⁹

Where the debtor directs his creditors to bring suit against himself and to garnish his employer for wages due him, he is estopped from later claiming his exemption therein;⁹⁰ but it has been held that procuring the garnishment of a debt due him does not estop the debtor from claiming exemption out of a debt which exceeds the amount of the exemption, for the debtor's conduct is not inconsistent with an intention to appropriate only the excess to the payment of the execution.⁹¹

A person who, in seeking to qualify as surety on a bail bond, represents himself as owning certain

property above his debts and exemptions will be estopped later from claiming exemption in such property when judgment is obtained against him on the bond.⁹² A person who holds himself out to a creditor as doing business as a partnership is estopped to set up that he is doing business as an individual so as to be able to claim exemption in the business property.⁹³

A wife who is entitled to exempt property is not estopped by her husband's representations or conduct as to the character or ownership of the exempt property;⁹⁴ nor is she estopped from asserting the invalidity of a mortgage executed by her husband alone, without her knowledge or consent, on exempt property, because, on learning of the mortgage after her husband's death, she inquires about it and discusses with the mortgagee the possibility of selling the mortgaged property and getting her equity out of it.^{94.5}

Acceptance of proceeds. If the debtor demands and receives a surplus from the sale of his property, it has been held that he is estopped to claim damages from the officer who seized and sold the property, although at the time of the assignment the debtor asked to have his exemption set off;⁹⁵ but there is authority to the contrary.⁹⁶

Failure to make claim. The rule that a person, who is silent when he should speak, will not be heard when he would speak is generally held to apply to a debtor who fails to make his claim at the time of the levy, and later endeavors to hold the creditor or the officer responsible for taking his goods;⁹⁷ but silence does not estop the debtor if it does not have the tendency to mislead the creditor and the latter is not prejudiced thereby.⁹⁸

If the debtor voluntarily surrenders property levied on without claiming the exemption, he is estopped from afterward asserting the claim;⁹⁹ but under a foreign state would be immaterial in the action.

property absolutely exempt, regardless of whether a claim to its exemption is made or not, may be listed as a part of a debtor's estate in bankruptcy without operating to estop him later from claiming his exemption therein.¹ Where one who is entitled to an exemption in land, on the ground that it has been purchased with pension money, fails to assert his claim or to disclose the fact in a sale of the land, he is estopped to make such claim as against the innocent purchaser.²

Disclaimer of title. If, at the time of the levy, the debtor denies ownership of the property levied on, and the creditor or officer acts on the denial to his prejudice, he is estopped from claiming the right to exemption therein at a later time;³ but, when the disclaimer of title has not influenced the conduct of the officer or been acted on by him or plaintiff in the execution, it will not estop the debtor from afterward asserting and proving his title thereto as owner, and claiming the property as exempt.⁴ A disclaimer of ownership operates as an estoppel only in the proceedings in which the disclaimer is made, so that, if they are discontinued and new proceedings started, the disclaimer made in the proceedings does not estop the person who made it from claiming his exemption in the later proceedings.⁵

§ 116. Forfeiture

A violation of law not affecting the debtor's status under the exemption law does not necessarily operate as a forfeiture of his exemption right, and, as related to the rights of others, his act, in order so to operate, must amount to a dereliction of some duty which he owes to them. The mere fact that exempt property and non-exempt property are intermingled does not destroy his right to claim his exemption.

A violation of law not affecting the debtor's status under the exemption law does not necessarily operate as a forfeiture of his exemption right.⁶ As related to the rights of others, the debtor's act, in order to operate as a forfeiture of his exemption right, must amount to a dereliction of some duty which he owes to them.⁷ The fact that the debtor squandered money in gambling or other wasteful practices,⁸ or that he was about to use,⁹ or had contracted to use,¹⁰ his exempt property in another state does not affect his right to exemption. Where the debtor voluntarily leaves his wages with his employer until they cease to be current wages, he may lose his right of exemption therein,¹¹ but he does not lose the right by temporarily refusing to accept a part of the wages and insisting on immediate payment of the whole amount due.¹² A debtor's right of exemption is not defeated by acts of other persons, such as by an unlawful sale by the assignee in bankruptcy or insolvency,¹³ or by a garnishee's permitting a judgment by default or paying the money garnished where no notice or opportunity to protect his rights has been given to the debtor.¹⁴

Intermingling of property. The mere fact that exempt property is mingled with nonexempt does not destroy the debtor's right to claim his exemption,¹⁵ and, where property already set off as exempt is mingled with nonexempt property, the debtor's right to his exemption depends on his ability to identify the property already so designated.¹⁶ A purchaser is under no obligation to preserve the identity of purchased property in order to enable the vendor to enforce his claim against it, and, if he mingles the purchased property with other property so that the vendor is unable to identify it and enforce his claim against it, he does not thereby forfeit his rights of exemption.¹⁷

§ 117. — Failure to File Schedule; Omission from Schedule

A debtor's failure to file a schedule of property may operate as a forfeiture of his right to an exemption. The omission of property from the schedule without fraudulent intent will not defeat a claim of property included therein, but it will defeat a claim of property omitted, even though omitted by mistake.

When the statute requires a debtor claiming an exemption as against a levy to make out and file a schedule of all his property, failure to file a schedule will operate as a forfeiture of his right to an exemption.¹⁸ Although the statute may require the debtor to include all his property in the schedule, and may provide that property not included shall not be exempt, the omission of property from the schedule without fraudulent intent will not defeat a claim of property included in the schedule,¹⁹ but it will defeat a claim of property omitted, even though omitted by mistake.²⁰ An omission from a prior schedule will not defeat the right.²¹

The necessity and sufficiency of a schedule or inventory are considered infra § 136.

§ 118. — Fraud; Fraudulent Conveyance or Concealment

- a. In general
- b. Fraudulent conveyance
- c. Concealing or withholding property

a. In General

While there is some authority to the contrary, the general rule is that a debtor does not forfeit his right to an exemption by reason of the fact that he has acted fraudulently toward his creditors.

According to the weight of authority, a debtor does not forfeit his right to an exemption by reason of the fact that he has acted fraudulently toward his creditors;²² but there is some authority to the contrary,²³ with the qualifications, however, that fraud is not a bar to a claim for exemption where it is independent of the transaction in which the property is levied on,²⁴ and, further, that the acts which will prevent a claim of exemption must be the acts of the debtor or those for which he is responsible.²⁵ That the debt may have been fraudulently contracted will not prevent the debtor from claiming his exemption.²⁶

A debtor has been denied the right to claim an exemption in property acquired by him in fraud of creditors.²⁷

*The mere dissolution of an insolvent firm and the division of its assets accomplished without actual fraud, even though it is done for the purpose of securing to the members of the firm the benefit of individual exemptions, is not such legal or constructive fraud as will deprive the debtors of their exemptions.*²⁸

b. Fraudulent Conveyance

Under most authorities, the fact that the debtor has attempted a fraudulent conveyance will not deprive him of his exemption rights; and the conversion of non-exempt into exempt property with the effect of hindering creditors does not prevent the debtor from claiming rights of exemption. The transferee of exempt property conveyed to place it beyond the reach of, and to defraud, creditors may sometimes retain the property against the claim of creditors.

According to the more generally accepted rule, the fact that the debtor has attempted a fraudulent conveyance of his property will not deprive him of his exemption rights therein.²⁹ Under this view, the creditors cannot claim against a sale as fraudulent and at the same time deny the debtor's right to assert an exemption in the property conveyed,³⁰ and, where a conveyance is set aside as fraudulent, the debtor may have an exemption in the proceeds.³¹

In some jurisdictions, however, it is held either that a debtor who has conveyed his property in fraud of creditors cannot, when it is seized or sold, claim his exemption from the proceeds,³² or that, where the debtor has sold property, although fraudulently, no title remains in him on which he may claim exemption,³³ and on setting aside the conveyance, the property does not again become the property of the debtor as against the claims of creditors so that he may be permitted to assert an exemption therein.³⁴

A debtor who has made a fraudulent disposition of his property before levy cannot claim the property as his own and recover of the officer selling on the ground that it was exempt from execution.³⁵ The doctrine that the conveyance of property to defraud creditors does not deprive the grantor of the right to claim and hold such property as exempt does not apply to property to which an exempt character has not attached at the time of its conveyance.³⁶

Exempt property as subject of fraudulent conveyance is considered in Fraudulent Conveyances § 30.

Conveyance of other property. In some jurisdictions, a debtor's right to an exemption is not affected by the fact that he has conveyed other property in fraud of his creditors,³⁷ as, for example, where he has sold all his property except that which is exempt.³⁸ This is particularly true where the exemption is regarded as being in favor of the family of the debtor rather than of the debtor,³⁹ and no property fraudulently transferred or disposed of in any way to prevent its application to the payment of debts can be treated as a part of the debtor's exempt property.⁴⁰ However, in other jurisdictions where defendant has, for the purpose of defrauding, delaying, or hindering his creditors, aliened, concealed, or otherwise disposed of all of his property except such as he desires to hold as exempt, he cannot claim such property as exempt,⁴¹ and if, after a levy, he disposes of other property not levied on or places it out of the reach of process, that may be considered as an election to claim his exemption in such property.⁴²

A debtor is not precluded from claiming his exemption by the fact that he had previously owned other property which he had sold and the proceeds of which he had transferred to his wife.⁴³

empt property to other creditors is considered supra § 108.

Conversion of nonexempt into exempt property. Notwithstanding exempt property has been purchased with the proceeds of nonexempt property with the effect of hindering and delaying creditors of the debtor, it may be claimed as exempt.⁴⁴ This is particularly true where the amount of all of the property does not exceed the amount of the debtor's exemptions.⁴⁵

When the exemption provided for articles of a certain kind is absolute, one who has purchased property of the kind which is not exempt and has not paid for it may convert it into property of the kind which is exempt with the deliberate purpose of having his property in an exempt condition and hold it as against the creditor whose crediting has enabled him to acquire it.⁴⁶

Rights of transferee. According to the weight of authority, where exempt property is transferred, the transferee may retain it as against the claim of the transferor's creditors, notwithstanding the intent of the debtor was to place it beyond the reach of, and to defraud, his creditors.⁴⁷ According to some authorities, however, the fraudulent transferee is not entitled to set up the debtor's exemption rights;⁴⁸ and in jurisdictions adhering to the general rule, it has been limited to cases in which the property has been previously selected as exempt or is specifically exempt under the statute.⁴⁹

c. Concealing or Withholding Property

Under express statutory provisions, willful fraud in concealing property will forfeit the debtor's right to exemption. The authorities are not in accord as to whether, in the absence of statute, a fraudulent concealment of property by the debtor will have this effect.

By express provision of the statutes in some jurisdictions, in order to be entitled to an exemption, the debtor must make a full and fair disclosure of his property, and forfeits his right to exemption by willful fraud in the concealment of a part thereof.⁵⁰ In the absence of statute, it is held in some jurisdictions that the debtor does not forfeit his right to exemption by the concealment of property from the levying officer;⁵¹ and the fact that the debtor omits property from his schedule and swears falsely as to its completeness does not preclude him from claiming and holding property levied on as exempt.⁵²

In other jurisdictions, the debtor is regarded as forfeiting his right to an exemption by the fraudulent concealment of other property liable to execution for the purpose of hindering and delaying his creditors,⁵³ and, where the debtor fraudulently conceals and withholds property from execution, he will, in some jurisdictions, be held to have claimed his exemptions therein and to the amount of the property withheld will be precluded from claiming an exemption in other property levied on.⁵⁴

In a number of cases in which the question of fraudulent conveyances was not involved, it has been held that the debtor forfeits his right to exemption if he equivocates or dissembles or denies ownership of that which he cannot hide, and embarrasses the officers of the law in the execution of their legal duties.^{54.5}

VII. ESTABLISHMENT, ENFORCEMENT, AND PROTECTION OF RIGHT

§ 119. In General

The manner of establishing a claim to an exemption depends on the terms of the statute under which the claim is made which must be followed.

The existence, nature, and extent of the debtor's right to assert a claim to an exemption, and the procedure to be followed in establishing the right claimed, are determined by the terms of the statute under which the claim is made,⁵⁵ although the existence of the right is not affected by a failure of the statute to prescribe procedure or forms for its establishment.⁵⁶ Statutory regulations, unless abrogated,⁵⁷ as to the manner of obtaining or asserting an exemption are exclusive;⁵⁸ in order to obtain the benefits of the statute claimant must comply with its terms⁵⁹ and constitutional provisions relating thereto,⁶⁰ and he must bring himself at least within the intent of the provisions of the statute.⁶¹ The claim that property is exempt from seizure for debt must be made in good faith and be supported by credible testimony.⁶² It is not sufficient to show that property is of the kind exempt but it must be shown to be in fact exempt.⁶³

§ 120. Persons Who May Assert Claim

can, as a general rule, be pleaded or taken advantage of only by the execution or attachment debtor,⁶⁵ or by someone acting in his behalf,⁶⁶ such as his wife or a member of his family,⁶⁷ the test being whether the claim, made either by the debtor or someone for him, is being made for the benefit of the debtor or his family, or whether it is being made for the benefit of someone else not entitled to the benefit of the exemption statute.⁶⁸ So, where the judgment debtor, after giving notice of his intention to claim an exemption in property levied on, dies before he can establish his claim, the widow may assert the claim.⁶⁹ A debtor's agent may claim his exemptions for him under an express authority,⁷⁰ or under an authority implied from his being left in charge of the property during the debtor's temporary absence.⁷¹

Claimant's status is fixed at the time of the levy of the execution and not at the time he makes his claim.⁷² Under a statute exempting the proceeds of a life insurance policy, the status of the beneficiary must be determined as of the time the insurance is effected, or the beneficiary named,^{72.5} rather than at the time the proceeds are payable.^{72.10} Under another statute exempting certain pensions from execution and which expressly limits such exemption to state citizens, the citizenship is to be determined as of the date the attachment is made, rather than that on which the right to the pension arose.^{72.15} debtor must, both as essential to the regularity of the levy and to his protection from personal liability, comply with the requirements, if any, imposed by statute for the purpose of safeguarding the debtor in his exemption rights.⁷³ In all cases the officer should act fairly and in good faith toward debtors who are honestly and in good faith seeking to avail themselves of the benefits of the exemption law,⁷⁴ as by calling the debtor's attention to omissions.⁷⁵ His powers are ministerial, not judicial.⁷⁶ He may disregard a claim of exemption which the statute does not authorize,⁷⁷ but he has no power to pass on the sufficiency thereof.⁷⁸

b. Notice to Debtor

It is ordinarily the duty of a levying officer to notify the debtor of his right of exemption.

It is ordinarily the duty of an officer having a writ or process in his hands to notify the debtor of his right of exemption,⁷⁹ although it has been held that such notice is not necessary, if it is not required by statute,⁸⁰ and that the officer may take and sell the debtor's property under execution, if not informed by the debtor of the exemption.⁸¹ Before summoning a garnishee it has been held that notice of his rights should be given the debtor.⁸²

The rule requiring the officer to give notice exists to give defendant an opportunity to claim his exemption⁸³ and to surrender other property not selected or exempt for satisfaction of the judgment.⁸⁴

the debtor has been held to be mandatory,⁸⁵ and not complied with by a notice by the creditor to the debtor.⁸⁶ Unless required by statute, such notice need not be by advertisement in a newspaper.⁸⁷ An ambiguously worded notice by mail from which the debtor may infer that personal demand will be made of him at some time in the future is not in good faith and is insufficient.⁸⁸

Notice to the debtor may be excused by the fact that he has, in advance of the levy, notified the officer that he claims exemption for all of his property,⁸⁹ or by the fact that he has filed a schedule and claim of exemption,⁹⁰ or by the fact that he cannot be found after diligent search⁹¹ or is not in the county.⁹² If, however, the officer knows of the residence of the debtor in an adjoining county and can reach him by the exercise of reasonable diligence, it is then his duty to apprise him of his rights of exemption.⁹³ Failure to notify the debtor of his exemption rights may require a levy to be quashed where it has been made on property that could be held as exempt under any provision of the statute,⁹⁴ although it has been held not to invalidate the levy or sale of real estate.⁹⁵

c. Inventory, Appraisal, and Setting Apart

It may be the duty of the levying officer to cause an inventory and appraisal to be made, and to allow or require the debtor to select the property exempted, or, in case of the debtor's absence or neglect, to make the selection himself.

Under some statutes, it is the duty of the officer to cause an inventory and appraisal to be made, and to allow the debtor to select the amount exempted,⁹⁶ and the officer cannot assume⁹⁷ or be compelled⁹⁸ to make the selection for the debtor, unless authorized by statute to do so,⁹⁹ as where, if the debtor neglects to do so or is absent, the officer is required to make the selection and set it apart.¹ Under other statutes the officer must require the debtor to make his selection, and at the time of the levy.²

A statute requiring the officer to make an inventory and appraisal of the debtor's property and to give to the debtor the inventory from which he is to make his selection does not require that the officer should also give the debtor the appraisal of the property, which he has made.³ Under such a statute the officer is entitled to a reasonable time within which to make and serve his inventory.⁴

§ 122. Process and Proceedings against Which Exemption May Be Claimed

Exemption statutes are generally construed as being applicable to any process or proceeding by which it is sought to subject the property, unless the statute excludes such a construction.

The tendency of the courts is to construe exemption statutes as applicable to any process or proceeding by which it is sought to subject the property, if the statute does not by its terms clearly exclude such a construction.⁵ A creditor cannot, by going into a court of equity, reach and subject to the satisfaction of his claim property or credits which the debtor would be entitled to claim as exempt in an action or proceeding at law.⁶

§ 123. — Attachment and Garnishment

An exemption right may generally be claimed against an attachment or against a garnishment or trustee process as well as against an execution.

As a general rule the exemption right is held to embrace attachments as well as executions.⁷ An exemption of property from seizure and sale generally is held to include an exemption from attachment,⁸ and an exemption from execution has been extended to include an exemption from attachment,⁹ although the contrary has also been held.¹⁰ If property exempt from attachment is taken under such process, it is the duty of the court, when the fact is brought to its notice, to order the property released.¹¹

Property exempted in terms from execution and attachment, or from execution merely, is generally also held exempt from garnishment or trustee process, and, when it is sought to reach such property by this process the debtor may intervene and assert his right,¹² or the garnishee may show that the amount owing by him to the debtor is exempt;¹³ and the garnishee may also set up an exemption to which he would be personally entitled, if the execution is issued against him as if the judgment were his own private debt.¹⁴

A statute exempting property only from levy and sale on an execution or by distress for rent by implication has been held to give a right of exemption against a domestic attachment execution,¹⁵ but not against a foreign attachment, which is not an execution at all,¹⁶ or against an original attachment, to compel defendant to appear.¹⁷

An exemption of wages may be claimed in garnishment proceedings under a statute exempting from execution generally.¹⁸ Where there are successive services of garnishment, the principal defendant is entitled to, and the garnishee or trustee may reserve for the benefit of claimant of exemptions, the amount allowed by the exemption act on each service.¹⁹ Whether property in the hands of a garnishee is exempt is determinable as of the date of the garnishee summons.²⁰

A distress for rent has been held a process or proceeding against which exemption may be claimed.

A constitutional provision, exempting property "from attachment and sale under mesne or final process issued from any court" has been held not to exempt such property from a distress warrant for rent, the warrant not being a process issued from a court, but a proceeding which the landlord issues by his own act and on his own responsibility.²¹ On the other hand it has been held that a provision exempting property "from forced sale or any process of law" does exempt from distress for rent,²² but the provision is not violated where the landlord merely retains possession of the property to enforce his lien for the rent.^{22.5} A statute providing expressly that "no property should be exempt from execution, when the process is for rent," applies also in the case of an attachment for rent, as its object is to abolish all exemption as against demands for rent without regard for the form of action pursued to recover them.²³ Under some statutes exemption from execution and distress for rent is restricted to particular articles, such as specified household necessities.²⁴ It has been held that, if the goods of a tenant's wife have been seized, she is not entitled to the benefit of the general exemption law,²⁵ although a constitutional provision declaring that a wife's property shall not be subject to levy and sale for her husband's debts exempts her property from liability to distress for rent due from her husband.²⁶ Joint owners of chattels levied on under distress for rent due on a lease signed by them jointly are not entitled to the benefit of the exemption law.²⁷

ties which have already been considered supra §§ 70-92, exempt property cannot be reached by execution,²⁸ nor does an execution create a lien thereon.²⁹ Although, as stated infra § 126, exemption cannot be claimed against a foreclosure proceeding on a mortgage, if the creditor, instead of foreclosing the mortgage, obtains a judgment on the mortgage debt, and levies on the property mortgaged, the owner may claim his exemption.³⁰ A debtor may have a levy of execution on exempt property set aside,³¹ and a sale of such property under execution passes no title.³²

On the other hand, the lien of an execution may attach where the exempt property has not been selected by the debtor, if not specifically exempt by the statute and a selection is required,³³ or where the debtor has not complied with statutory requirements as to the filing of a schedule,³⁴ the obtaining of a supersedeas,³⁵ or the securing of an appraisal, as discussed infra § 137. A subsequently accruing right of exemption will not defeat the lien of an execution levied on personal property.³⁶ Under some statutes, a levy may be made on personal property claimed as exempt where the execution plaintiff makes an affidavit and gives a bond as prescribed by the statute.³⁷

emption also apply, either by express provision or by implication, in proceedings supplementary to, and in aid of, execution.³⁸

§ 126. — Foreclosure Proceedings

Exemption cannot be successfully claimed against a foreclosure proceeding under a mortgage on the property.

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise,^{38.50} exemption cannot be successfully claimed against a foreclosure proceeding on a mortgage;³⁹ neither can it be claimed against a judgment on a bond accompanying the mortgage.⁴⁰ The surplus proceeds of a foreclosure sale have been held exempt against existing judgment creditors under a statute which exempts property to a certain amount.⁴¹ Where the statute exempts the property of volunteers for military service, from sale under deeds of trust, mortgages, or judgment, the appointment of a receiver to take charge of mortgaged premises after judgment for foreclosure when the mortgagor is in the military service of the United States is a violation of the statute.⁴²

not be allowed where it will defeat a debtor's exemption rights;⁴³ and, accordingly, mutual judgments cannot be set off one against the other in such a manner as to defeat the exemption laws.⁴⁴ This is particularly true where it is sought to enforce a set-off against a judgment for trespass to, or conversion of, the exempt property,⁴⁵ or against an action for replevin of the property.⁴⁶ In some states, however, the right of plaintiff to hold property exempt from execution does not impair the right of a defendant to set off a debt which plaintiff owes him against a debt which he owes plaintiff,⁴⁷ and a judgment recovered for the value of personal property, exempt from execution, converted by the judgment debtor, by a levy on and sale of it, is not itself exempt, and may be set off against a judgment held by the judgment debtor against the judgment creditor in it.⁴⁸ It has been held that an exemption "from the sale under execution, or other final process" is not enforceable before judgment so as to destroy the right of counter-claim or set-off.⁴⁹

According to some authorities where an exempt claim has been assigned, a set-off cannot be allowed against it,⁵⁰ although there is also authority to the contrary.⁵¹

to the public in the enjoyment of personal and property rights.⁶¹

§ 129. Claim

The necessity for a claim of exemption, the time of its making, its form and sufficiency, and presentation and filing, are discussed infra §§ 130-133.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 130. — Necessity

A debtor, in order to have the benefit of an exemption, ordinarily must claim his right, unless he has no property other than that which is exempt by law, or specific articles involved are absolutely exempted by statute.

Under statutes which expressly require a claim and selection by the debtor to be made, or which by implication require a selection by the debtor, as where they exempt property not exceeding a certain sum in value or a certain number of articles or animals of a particular kind, it is the almost universal rule that the debtor in order to have the benefit of the exemption must claim his right,⁶² although there is some authority to the effect that the failure of the debtor to claim his exemption of specific property as permitted by the statute at the time of levy does not preclude him from claiming as exempt the proceeds of the sale of the items of property which he subsequently selects.⁶³ If, however, the debtor has no property except what is exempt by law, it becomes, thereby, specifically exempt, and it is unnecessary to make claim.⁶⁴

A claim of exemption under one execution may not and usually does not dispense with the necessity of the claim under other different executions where the different executions were issued on different judgments.⁶⁵ It has even been held that a claim under the original execution will not suffice to protect the debtor on the levy of an alias;⁶⁶ but there is authority to the contrary.⁶⁷ It has been said, however, that, where several writs are in the sheriff's hands at the same time, one demand is sufficient as against them all.⁶⁸ Where other property is levied on under the other execution, a claim of exemption made after the levy of the first execution on certain property is not sufficient.⁶⁹ In garnishment, when the garnishee in his answer admits an indebtedness to defendant under a continuing contract, and a claim of exemption is made by defendant, and, on appeal, he admits a further indebtedness, which has accrued under the contract since his first answer was filed, this indebtedness is not included in the claim of exemptions already filed, and is liable to plaintiff's demand unless a new claim is interposed.⁷⁰

A mortgagor must claim such exemption in order to secure it in the surplus proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property on foreclosure,⁷¹ or in order to affect the title under the mortgage.⁷²

Specific exemptions. By the weight of authority when the statute exempts specific articles absolutely, without expressly or impliedly requiring any selection by the debtor, the debtor does not lose his right to claim the articles as exempt by failure to assert the claim at the time of a levy.⁷³ Under some statutes, the rule is qualified to the effect that the debtor need not make a claim in the first instance, and does not waive his rights by failing to object to a levy unless he fails or refuses to make designation or selection of property which he claims as exempt when required to do so by the officer.⁷⁴ Other statutes, exempting specific articles absolutely, require in express terms that a claim be made,⁷⁵ the claim, in such case, serving not as an identification of the exempt articles, but as the exercise of an option.⁷⁶ Where the exempt character of an article made specifically exempt by statute depends on the nature of its use by the debtor, the debtor must at least inform the officer of the nature of the use, a fact known only to the debtor, before he is entitled to an exemption therein.⁷⁷ Where the person holding or directing the service of the writ knows at the time of the service that the property levied on is exempt,⁷⁸ or where the debtor has specific property only to the amount of exemption allowed by law, there is additional ground for holding that the debtor is not required to make a claim.⁷⁹ A statute requiring an officer to levy an execution on any personal property in the possession of, or that he has reason to believe belongs to, defendant, unless he has received notice in writing from some other person that the property belongs to him, applies only to persons other than the execution defendant, and does not require him to notify the sheriff that property levied on belongs to him, and that he claims it as exempt, before he can maintain an action to recover the property as being exempt.⁸⁰

There must be a compliance with an express statutory designation of the time within which a claim of exemption must be made. In the absence of such an express provision, it has been held that the claim must or may be made at various times, the time, in a particular case, being controlled, to some extent, by the general provisions of the statute as to claims of exemption, the circumstances of the case, and the effect the claim, as made at the time in question, will have on the rights of the creditor.

Where the statute expressly designates the time within which a claim of exemption is to be made, such provision must be complied with,⁸¹ such as that it must be made within a specified time after levy or notice of execution,⁸² or within a reasonable time thereafter,⁸³ or at any time before sale,⁸⁴ or at any time before the property is subjected by sale or otherwise under judgment, decree, order, execution, or other legal process.⁸⁵

In the absence of an express provision as to time of making, it has been variously held that the claim must be made at the time of the levy if the debtor is present,⁸⁶ but there is also authority to the contrary;⁸⁷ that it must be made within a reasonable time,⁸⁸ or promptly,⁸⁹ or timely,^{89.5} or before the creditor has taken any step involving further costs,⁹⁰ or before advertisement and sale,⁹¹ or before sale,⁹² or within a reasonable time before sale,⁹³ or before the sale has commenced,⁹⁴ but as to the last there is also authority to the contrary.⁹⁵ However, a strict rule as to the time of making the claim will not be applied if no costs or expenses have been incurred, and the exemption can be allowed without prejudice to the rights of creditors.⁹⁶

Claim for partnership property. Where a partner is allowed to sever his interest and to claim exemptions whenever the partnership property is levied on, he is entitled to a reasonable time within which to do so.⁹⁷

What constitutes reasonable time. What is a reasonable time of course will depend on the circumstances of the particular case,⁹⁸ and one of the circumstances to be considered is whether the delay in any way prejudiced the creditor.⁹⁹

Excuse for delay. The statutory time for making a claim is not extended by the pendency of replevin proceedings against the levying officer by a third person to recover the property levied on and to which the debtor is not a party.¹ A wife claiming the exemption, as head of the family, must make her claim within the statutory period, which cannot be extended on the ground that her husband had failed to claim the exemption in the first instance.²

After sale. It has been held that a claim out of the proceeds of sale in court would be too late,³ but there are circumstances which have been held sufficient to allow a claim then made,⁴ as where perishable property is sold after attachment under statutes providing for sale under such circumstances;⁵ and, under some statutes, it has been held that the claim may be made at any time before an order of court appropriating such proceeds,⁶ and that, if the property is levied on and sold without a demand that a claim of exemption be made, the exemption may be claimed from the proceeds of the sale at any time before payment is made to the creditor.⁷

Necessity of notice of levy. The debtor is not bound to file a claim until he has notice of levy or until a reasonable time after receiving notice,⁸ unless, as under some statutes, he must file his claim within a certain number of days after notice.⁹ Where a statute requires the filing or the making of a claim to exemption by the principal debtor within a certain number of days after notice, and also provides that, in case of the refusal or neglect of the principal debtor to make the claim, the claim to his exemption may be made by his wife or children, but does not specify in their case any limit of time within which the claim must be made, their right to the claim is not controlled by the statutory provision which has reference only to the principal debtor but may be made within a reasonable time after notice.¹⁰

Attachment. If a statute expressly or impliedly requires the right of exemption to be passed on and adjudicated in attachment proceedings, defendant cannot for the first time after final judgment in such proceedings claim the attached property or debt as exempt from process issued on the judgment.¹¹ This rule does not apply when the statute merely exempts property from execution and attachment, or from forced sale, and does not require

Garnishment. The rule of liberal construction applies as to the time when a claim for exemption must be filed in a garnishment proceeding, and under this rule the claim may be made within the time for the appearance or answer in the garnishee summons.¹³ The claim must be made seasonably, otherwise it will be deemed waived.^{13.5} What is a reasonable time under this rule will depend on the circumstances of each case.^{13.10}

While under some statutes the debtor may assert his exemption as against garnishment proceedings at any time before sale,¹⁴ under other statutes a judgment against the garnishee is an adjudication of the right to exemption and the debtor's claim must be made before judgment,¹⁵ or before payment of funds in the hands of the garnishee to the creditor, pursuant to a judgment.¹⁶ The debtor may assert his exemption where the garnishee has paid the money involved into court.^{16.5}

These rules assume that the debtor had notice of the garnishment or attachment.¹⁷ It has been held that, in the case of an insurance policy, a claim to the exemption may be made at any time before the proceeds of the policy are paid over,¹⁸ and, where the statute exempts wages absolutely, while an order made by a court in a proceeding in garnishment after judgment cannot be attacked collaterally, the garnishee afterward may set up facts showing the amount owing by such garnishee to the debtor to be exempt from attachment or execution.¹⁹ After defendant in garnishment has given bond for dissolution of the garnishment and the fund has been paid over to him by the garnishee, he may interpose his claim.²⁰

Attachment execution. In cases of attachment execution under some statutes, defendant is not bound to make claim to exemption to the officer serving the attachment, for the officer has nothing to do with the collection of the debt and cannot have it appraised, but the claim may and must be made at the term to which the attachment is returnable, and before plaintiff has taken any step in the cause to his detriment, for want of notice of the claim, as by incurring costs, counsel fees, etc., if defendant has notice of the attachment.²¹ If the claim is made at the time the garnishee files his answer,²² or before the garnishee has answered the interrogatories propounded by plaintiff, it is in time.²³ It is too late, however, if not made until after the filing of the answer to interrogatories,²⁴ or if made by plea to the scire facias,²⁵ or on the trial between the attaching creditor and the garnishee.²⁶ If the debtor has not had notice or has not been served, he may and must make his claim within a reasonable time after notice,²⁷ and if the creditor has incurred expenses or costs between the return day of the writ and the time when the debtor filed his claim, the burden of proof is on the debtor to show when he received notice of the attachment and that he filed his claim within a reasonable time after receiving notice;²⁸ but, if no costs were incurred by the creditor between the return day of the writ and the filing of the claim to exemption by the debtor, the question of reasonable time and burden of proof does not arise.²⁹ The fact that no steps are taken by plaintiff in further prosecuting his suit for a long period of time will not excuse defendant from making his claim to exemption within a reasonable time.³⁰

Foreclosure and other proceedings. An exemption in a fund in court should be claimed by the debtor while the matter is being adjudicated and before final decree.³¹ Where the income of a life estate in realty has been sequestrated to satisfy an execution, the right to an exemption will not be considered until the distribution of the funds collected by the sequestrator.³² As against other creditors, a claim to exemption in the surplus proceeds is good, if made within a reasonable time after the sale;³³ but it has been held that, where the surplus was paid into court and an auditor appointed to make distribution and the audit allowed to proceed to its close before defendant claimed his exemption, he was too late,³⁴ and it has even been held that a claim of exemption, made after a sale in proceedings on a mortgage, is too late as against a judgment creditor claiming the balance of the fund.³⁵ Where defendant in a pending action was by the court, on the application of a creditor of plaintiff, ordered to hold subject to the court's order any sum for which plaintiff might obtain judgment, and the court ordered defendant to pay the creditor's claim when plaintiff secured a judgment, after payment it is too late to claim exemption of the judgment in lieu of homestead, although an adjustment of an excessive payment is still to be made by plaintiff's creditor.³⁶

A mortgagor should assert his claim to exemption at the hearing for the appointment of a receiver in foreclosure.³⁷ He cannot make claim after the mortgaged property has been ordered to be sold,³⁸

and is not entitled to claim his exemption out of the proceeds derived from a foreclosure sale before the entire decree has been satisfied.³⁹

In partition proceedings, a debtor who is one of the part owners should claim his exemption when the matter is being adjudicated by the court on the intervention of his judgment creditors, as the decree in the partition proceedings is final as to the rights of the parties.⁴⁰

§ 132. — Form and Sufficiency

A claim of exemption asserted substantially in the manner prescribed by the statute is ordinarily sufficient, and no particular language is necessary unless it is expressly required. These rules apply as to stating the grounds for, and existence of, the exemption, the description and ownership of the property claimed as exempt, and the disclosure of other property.

Statutory provisions as to the mode in which the claim of exemption is to be made are to be liberally construed.⁴¹ The debtor must assert the claim substantially in the manner prescribed by the statute; otherwise it is equivalent to no claim at all, and may be disregarded by the officer.⁴² It has been held that the exemption must be asserted by an answer to the writ and not by exception thereto.^{42.5} A substantial compliance with the statute is sufficient, however, and technical objections will not defeat his claim.⁴³ Where partners claim their several exemptions, it is sufficient if each informs the officer making the levy and asks that he be permitted to make his selection.⁴⁴

Necessity of writing. Under some statutes, the claim need not be in writing,⁴⁵ and a mere demand

Partnership or individual property

Where it is uncertain how much of the property against which execution for a partnership debt has been issued is partnership property, and how much belongs to the individual partners, a rule to strike off the partners' separate claims for exemption will be discharged without prejudice to plaintiff's right to attack any appraisal which may be made on such claims.

of the benefit of the exemption laws is sufficient,⁴⁶ except that, where the execution is against real estate, a verbal notice of the claim communicated to the sheriff, but not communicated by him to plaintiff, or acted on, is insufficient.⁴⁷ Under other statutes, however, a claim in writing is required.⁴⁸

Terms and language. It is not necessary that the claim shall be in any particular language, unless so required by the statute;⁴⁹ and, if the right to the exemption has been substantially asserted, it will not be defeated by formal and technical objections.⁵⁰ If the terms and wording of the law are followed in making the claim, it is sufficient;⁵¹ but the statement must be one of facts, and not of mere conclusions of law,⁵² and, although the claim is in the language of the statute, if it states a mere conclusion of law, it is insufficient.⁵³

The claim must be a claim of an exemption in the property, and not merely an assertion of ownership therein.⁵⁴ The claim should be presented in such form that the court may determine from it whether the property seized is exempt.⁵⁵ It is sufficient if the debtor indicates clearly to the court the grounds of his claim and the facts to support it,⁵⁶ and in interpreting a claim the court must define the language used in its ordinary sense.⁵⁷ In some states, the test seems to be whether the claim is in language sufficiently clear to be understood by the officer.⁵⁸

Grounds and existence of exemption. It is not necessary for the debtor to cite the law under which he makes his claim,⁵⁹ but the facts averred should be legally sufficient to establish a case of exemption within the letter or the spirit of the statute.⁶⁰ It has even been held that a claimant may be entitled to his exemption, even though he has mistaken the grounds of his claim and has based it on one section of the statute when he should have brought it under another section.⁶¹ Where the statute requires that claimant be a resident, that fact must be alleged.⁶²

Exemption of horse

Allegations to dissolve attachment of defendant's race horse that the horse is defendant's sole means of support, that defendant is a laborer who habitually earns his living from money earned by racing the horse, and that by the attachment defendant is precluded from training the horse and thereby deprived of earning a livelihood, are insufficient to establish an exemption under statute exempting two horses by the use of which a laborer habitually earns his living, since the horses so exempted are intended in good faith to be used as instruments of husbandry or labor and must be work horses.

The claim need not state that the property was exempt at the time of service of the writ, where no such statement is required by the statute.⁶³ Where the statute exempts earnings which are necessary for the use of the family, the fact that the earnings claimed to be exempt are necessary should appear in the claim.⁶⁴ Under a statute declaring exempt sufficient provisions to sustain the family for a year, a claim for exemption must state what provisions and provender, if any, the debtor has on hand,⁶⁵ and a claim that the debtor has not sufficient provisions for himself and family for one year is not sufficient.⁶⁶ The debtor must claim only what the statute allows him to hold.⁶⁷

Description and ownership of property. If the statute does not require the application for an exemption to specify the particular property which defendant wishes to claim as exempt, it is not necessary for it to do so.⁶⁸ Such a specification is required, however, under some statutes.⁶⁹ Under some statutes where an exemption is sought by the wife, it must appear whether the property which she seeks as exempt is hers or her husband's,⁷⁰ but, where the claim is by the husband, it is not necessary for him to aver that the property is his.⁷¹ A statutory provision that notice of ownership be given by one claiming property as exempt to the officer is for the officer's protection,⁷² and, where the officer is protected by the creditor's indemnifying bond, insufficiency of the notice becomes immaterial.⁷³

Provisions in a statute relating to cases in which a third person is claiming to be the owner of property levied on, requiring a statement of the extent and nature of claimant's interest, the consideration paid, and from whom it was acquired, are not applicable to cases in which defendant admitting his ownership seeks to have property released on the ground that it is exempt from execution.⁷⁴ In garnishment, if the garnishee's answer admits generally indebtedness to defendant, the latter's claim to the fund garnished as being exempt is insufficient unless he gives bond to dissolve the garnishment or traverses the garnishee's answer.⁷⁵

Disclosure of other property. Where a debtor is required to surrender or point out to the officer all property he owns subject to execution, other than that selected or specifically exempt, as explained supra § 8, the claim must contain a disclosure of other property liable to execution, and must furnish a description thereof,⁷⁶ and his disclosure must be full and complete,⁷⁷ and his claim must contain a statement that the schedule is a complete list of all his property.⁷⁸

Signature. A notice of a claim of exemptions signed by two persons is sufficient as a claim for either separately,⁷⁹ and the fact that a claim of exemption made and signed by a man is also signed by his wife does not invalidate his claim.⁸⁰

Verification. A claim of exemption need be under oath only where it is so required by the statute.⁸¹ An agreed statement that debtor has claimed his exemption is not a sufficient compliance with a statute requiring a verified claim.⁸²

§ 133. — Presentation and Filing

The claim of exemption should be presented and filed with the officer or court, and in the manner prescribed by the statute.

Under some statutes, the claim for exemption may be made to, or filed with, the officer,⁸³ after giving a specified notice to the opposite party,⁸⁴ and it may be made when he is absent from his office,⁸⁵ if there are no provisions to the contrary. If it is properly filed, it is not affected by the fact that the officer attaches it by mistake to an execution in another case, if no prejudice is caused thereby to the creditor.⁸⁶ Under other statutes, however, it is not necessary that the claim should be made in the first instance to the officer.⁸⁷ Under still other statutes the procedure depends on whether a property levied on is money or property other than money, in the former instance the law requiring that the claim should be filed with the court, and in the latter case lodged with the officer.⁸⁸ Where a statute requires a defendant in garnishment proceedings claiming exemption to file his claim in writing, verified by oath, in the court in which such proceedings are pending, such claim must be filed in accordance with the statute to entitle defendant to claim his exemption.⁸⁹

In Georgia the constitutional exemption is perfected by an application, provided applicant is a resident of the county,⁹⁰ to the ordinary of the county which, when approved, is recorded.⁹¹ The statutory or short homestead is procured by merely filing with the ordinary the debtor's schedule of property claimed to be exempt,⁹² which is recorded by the ordinary in a book kept by him for that purpose.⁹³ The ordinary's acts in receiving and recording the schedule are ministerial only,⁹⁴ and although a prima facie case is made by proof that the property levied on is exempt and included in the homestead, set apart,⁹⁵ if applicant fails to comply with the statute the recording of the claim is a nullity,⁹⁶ and cannot be amended,⁹⁷ and moreover a creditor may attack the exemption by showing that it was illegal.⁹⁸

§ 134. — Waiver of Objections

Objection to the manner of making a claim of exemption may be waived by the officer receiving it or by the creditor.

If the officer gives a reason for refusing a claim of exemptions, he thereby waives all other objections to the manner of making it;⁹⁹ and a creditor who appears and contests the debtor's right to exemption thereby waives a statutory requirement as to notice of the claim.¹

§ 136. Schedule or Inventory

- a. In general
- b. Time
- c. Form and sufficiency
- d. Filing or delivery
- e. Notice or record
- f. Operation and effect

a. In General

Where the statute so provides, a debtor may be required to schedule the property which he claims as exempt or to schedule all of his property.

Under the provisions of some statutes, a debtor may claim his personal property as exempt by the filing of a schedule thereof in the manner required by law,² and such a statute may apply as to particular exemptions irrespective of any prior waiver by the debtor of either homestead or exemption rights.³ A schedule by the debtor of his property in connection with the claim of exemption must be made when required by statute.⁴ Under some statutes a schedule must be filed whether the debtor has more or less than the amount of property necessary to make up the total amount exempted to him,⁵ while under other statutes a schedule need be made only where the debtor has property in excess of the amount exempt,⁶ and need not be made where the debtor has no property other than that levied on, and he so states under oath.⁷ A statute which provides for the filing of an inventory where articles of personal property or choses in action are garnished and claimed as exempt applies to personal property other than wages,⁸ but does not apply to wages.⁹

If an execution issues to one county, the inventory and appraisal need not be made in all the counties where the debtor has property.¹⁰

Effect of failure to file. If the inventory which is required by statute to be filed is not filed, plaintiff is entitled, without tendering issue, to an order subjecting the property to process.¹¹ However, if he does tender issue and proceeds to trial, he waives his right to claim a default judgment on that ground.¹²

The inventory or schedule must, unless there is a valid excuse for the delay, be filed or presented within the time prescribed by statute, or, in the absence of a statutory requirement, within a reasonable time.

The inventory or schedule must be filed or presented within the time, if any, prescribed by statute, or within a reasonable time if no time is prescribed.¹³ In some states it must accompany the claim;¹⁴ but a supplemental schedule, if called for by the creditor, may be filed at any time before issues are formed.¹⁵

Excuses for delay; objection. A requirement that the debtor file a written schedule of property claimed to be exempt before sale may be relaxed if unavoidable casualty intervenes.¹⁶ If the officer fails to meet all the statutory requirements in giving notice of the levy to the debtor, the debtor may be excused from presenting his schedule within the statutory time.¹⁷ So, if the officer levying an execution misleads the debtor in regard to it, so that the debtor for that reason fails to file or present his schedule within the time prescribed by statute, he may file or present it after that time.¹⁸ If the officer gives the parties time to compromise their differences, and the negotiations fail, he should give the debtor a reasonable time after failure within which to file his schedule.¹⁹

Mere notice of intention

Where debtor notified judgment creditor that he intended to file schedule of claimed exemptions, and debtor's attorney who was present when debtor's personalty was sold at public sale gave oral public notice of debtor's intention to claim exemption, and schedule of exemptions was filed with the justice of the peace more than an hour after sale had been concluded, debtor could not recover property sold, since one who claims his property is exempt must file written schedule with the justice of the peace who issued the execution before sale and mere notice is not sufficient.

c. Form and Sufficiency

- (1) In general
- (2) Listing and specification of property
- (3) Disclosure of property
- (4) Claim of exemption
- (5) Right to exemption
- (6) Signature and verification
- (7) Objections and amendment

(1) In General

The schedule or inventory must comply substantially with statutory provisions as to form, although the statutes must be liberally construed and technical objections will not prevail.

The schedule or inventory must comply substantially with statutory provisions as to form.²¹ Such provisions must be liberally construed, however; technical objections will not be allowed to prevail,²² and, if the schedule is sworn to and the claim is in substantial compliance with the statutory requirements, the officer cannot refuse to set apart the property.²³ Unless the statute so requires, the inventory need not be made separately from the claim, but it may be made on the same paper and as a part of the claim verified by the same oath.²⁴

(2) Listing and Specification of Property

A schedule should list separately each article of a distinct kind, or of a distinct quality, grade, or description of the same kind, so as to enable the appraisers readily to identify and to fix the value of each article.

A schedule should list separately each article of a distinct kind, or of a distinct quality, grade, or description of the same kind,²⁵ so as to enable the appraisers readily to identify²⁶ and to fix the value of²⁷ each article. A schedule of property in distinct groups, each lumping together miscellaneous articles, is insufficient.²⁸ Where the only property owned by the debtor is money and the claim for exemption is for the full amount of the debt, however a sworn statement that the sum attached constituted all of claimant's personal property at the time the suit was brought may be a sufficient inventory.²⁹

Value. Where the statute provides for both a schedule and an appraisal, the schedule does not take the place of the appraisal as determining values, and hence it is immaterial whether it shows the debtor's property to be worth more or less than the statutory amount or whether it shows it to be of any value whatever.³⁰

Effect of defects. A schedule which does not purport to specify any particular property as exempt is, in at least one jurisdiction, void;³¹ but a mere vague and uncertain description will not be fatal if the property is later identified.³²

(3) Disclosure of Property

Statutes which require a debtor to make a schedule or inventory frequently require that it shall include all of his property, and property omitted from the schedule will not be entitled to exemption, although omission of some articles generally does not affect the debtor's right to exemption of articles actually scheduled.

Statutes which require a debtor to make a schedule or inventory frequently require that the sched-

Notice to purchaser

In Georgia, in order for a statutory or short homestead to be superior to the title of a bona fide purchaser without actual notice, the schedule of the property claimed as such homestead must contain a description sufficiently definite to impart constructive notice.

Grouping

A grouping together of different kinds of property, such as to render the listing in some degree defective, does not render an inventory void where it appears that all the property described is found at the place designated and is appraised.

Neb.—Farquhar v. Hibben, 57 N.W. 290, 38 Neb. 556.

Schedule held not void

Schedule enumerating household effects claimed exempt has been held not void, but sufficient to identify property, on being aided by parol proof that property constituted household effects possessed by applicant as head of family.

Ga.—Clark v. Prince, 144 S.E. 40, 38 Ga.App. 412.

ule or inventory shall include all of his property,³³ and the schedule must show that this requirement has been complied with.³⁴ Under some statutes, however, the schedule need not include property other than that which he claims as exempt.³⁵ A statutory requirement that claimant file two lists, one of all property owned by him and another of property claimed as exempt, is satisfied by a single list when the debtor claims all his personalty as exempt.³⁶

The schedule need include only the property owned by the debtor at the time the schedule is signed and sworn to,³⁷ unless a statute expressly requires the inclusion of property owned by him as of some other time.³⁸

Property omitted from the schedule will not be entitled to exemption³⁹ independently of any question of fraud, inadvertency, or mistake,⁴⁰ except that of the levying officer or of some third person interested in the collection of the execution;⁴¹ and a schedule omitting part of the debtor's property has even been held to be invalid.⁴² The omission of some articles generally does not affect the debtor's right to exemption of articles actually scheduled, however,⁴³ especially where the omission is not with fraudulent intent.⁴⁴

(4) Claim of Exemption

Where the statute requires a debtor to specify the particular property which he claims as exempt, a schedule of property which does not claim it or any portion of it as exempt is fatally defective.

Where the statute requires a debtor to specify the particular property which he claims as exempt, a schedule of property which does not claim it or any portion of it as exempt is fatally defective.⁴⁵

(5) Right to Exemption

Under some statutes the inventory must be accompanied by a verified statement of the debtor showing his right to the exemption claimed, or by a statement of the capacity in which he claims an exemption.

Under some statutes the inventory must be accompanied by a verified statement of the debtor showing his right to the exemption claimed,⁴⁶ or by a statement of the capacity in which he claims an exemption.⁴⁷ The affidavit should show that the debt sued for was a debt by contract,⁴⁸ and that it was contracted subsequent to the passage of the exemption laws.⁴⁹ In some jurisdictions the affidavit must show that claimant is a resident of the state.⁵⁰ The affidavit is also sometimes required to show that claimant is the head of a family,⁵¹ although it has also been held that it need not show this fact in the absence of a statutory requirement.⁵²

(6) Signature and Verification

The schedule or inventory must, if required by statute, be properly signed and verified.

The schedule or inventory must, if required by statute, be properly signed⁵³ and verified.⁵⁴ In such case the officer may disregard a schedule that is not sworn to;⁵⁵ but, if the schedule is sworn to, and the claim is in substantial compliance with the requirements of a statute, the officer cannot refuse to set apart the property on the ground of alleged perjury in the affidavit.⁵⁶

In at least one jurisdiction, the schedule must be signed and verified by the debtor himself, and a signing or verification by his attorney is insufficient.⁵⁷ The inventory should be verified at the very time it is filed, and not before.⁵⁸ The schedule may be verified by the same affidavit as the claim.⁵⁹ The verification need only state that the schedule contains a list of all the debtor's personal property on the date of the oath.⁶⁰

(7) Objections and Amendment

The officer is not bound to accept a schedule which is not in proper form, but his failure to object to its sufficiency at the time it is filed or delivered to him will not estop him from later contesting its sufficiency. The allowance of a new or amended inventory, where objection has been made to the original, after expiration of the time for filing an inventory as of right is discretionary with the court.

The officer is not bound to accept a schedule which is not in proper form,⁶¹ but it is not necessary for him to object to the sufficiency of the schedule at the time it is filed or delivered to him,⁶² and his failure to do so will not estop him from later contesting its sufficiency.⁶³ However, an officer may be estopped to raise objections to defects the existence of which may be attributed to his own dereliction of duty to the debtor.⁶⁴ The officer is bound to accept a proper schedule, and cannot dispute the truth of it.⁶⁵

Amendment. Where a defective inventory is filed and objected to, the allowance of filing of a new or amended inventory after expiration of the time within which defendant may file an inventory as of right is discretionary with the trial court.⁶⁶ A schedule may be amended so as to include property as to which the debtor is entitled to an exemption,^{66.5} or so as to exclude property as to which the debtor is not entitled to an exemption;⁶⁷ and the fact that the debtor delivered his schedule unsigned has been held not to preclude him from enforcing his right to exemption claimed therein, where the omission was inadvertent and he subsequently offered to sign the schedule or make another.⁶⁸ A schedule has been held not amendable, however, to cure a mistake of law.⁶⁹

The refusal of an officer to allow an execution debtor to amend his schedule has been held not to render the officer liable.⁷⁰

d. Filing or Delivery

Express provisions of the statute as to filing or delivery of the schedule or inventory must be complied with.

Express provisions of the statute as to the filing or delivery of the schedule or inventory,⁷¹ as, for example, provisions as to the particular officer with whom it shall be filed or to whom it shall be delivered,⁷² must be complied with. Where the statute requires the filing of the schedule with the justice, a filing with the constable is not sufficient;⁷³ and, on the other hand, where the statute requires that the schedule shall be delivered to the officer holding the execution or process, a delivery to the justice is insufficient.⁷⁴ Leaving the schedule at a place designated by the officer,⁷⁵ or with the officer's wife, with instructions to deliver it to him,⁷⁶ has been held sufficient. A statute requiring a debtor to deliver a schedule to the officer is sufficiently complied with where the debtor delivers a proper schedule to the officer, and the latter admits service thereon by copy, and returns the original to the debtor, retaining a copy.⁷⁷

e. Notice or Record

Where the statutes so require, the opposite party must be given notice before the schedule is filed, and the schedule must be recorded.

Sometimes it is required by statute that the opposite party shall be given notice before the schedule is filed,⁷⁸ or that the schedule shall not only be filed but also recorded.⁷⁹

f. Operation and Effect

The filing of a schedule in compliance with the statute imposes a burden or encumbrance on the property. Under some statutes the exemption will be presumed to be valid, or the schedule will be deemed conclusive as to both the property and its valuation unless attacked as fraudulent or unless an appraisal of the property listed is demanded.

a. Necessity

Where the statute so requires, an appraisal of the property claimed as exempt is essential to the exemption.

Where the statute so provides, it is essential to a right of exemption that the property claimed be appraised in accordance with the statute,⁸³ the purpose ordinarily being to ascertain whether the property exceeds in value the allowable exemption,⁸⁴ an appraisal ordinarily not being required as to articles made the subject of specific exemptions⁸⁵ or in case of a specific exemption of debts and wages.⁸⁶ Likewise an appraisal is not required where the debtor elects to receive his exemption in money.⁸⁷ However, where an appraisal, although required, has not been made, the debtor cannot claim an amount equal to that which he is entitled to claim as exempt from the proceeds of a sale of the property.⁸⁸ When the statute requires an appraisal, a new appraisal is necessary on each successive execution.⁸⁹

b. Duty to Procure

The duty of having the property appraised is generally imposed on the officer, and, when the debtor has complied with the statutory conditions, is mandatory and purely ministerial.

Constable

A statute which provides that the sheriff or other officer making a levy shall, on demand, summon the appraisers authorizes a constable levying an execution from a justice's court likewise to summon them.

N.C.—McAuley v. Morris, 7 S.E. 883, 101 N.C. 369.

is mandatory⁹¹ and purely ministerial.⁹² The officer is not justified in refusing to have an appraisal made because of perjury by the debtor in swearing to his schedule.⁹³

Effect of refusal. A wrongful refusal of the officer to cause an appraisal to be made has been held to render the sale void,⁹⁴ although there is also authority to the contrary.⁹⁵

c. Demand

Demand of appraisal is necessary only where the statute so provides, and, when required, a failure to make it operates as waiver of the rights of the party on whom the duty is imposed.

Under some statutes the requirement of appraisal does not depend on any demand made by the creditor or the debtor but is made on delivery by the debtor of a schedule to the levying officer claiming that the property levied on is exempt.⁹⁶

Where under the statute the debtor must demand the appraisal, a failure to make the demand constitutes a waiver by the debtor of his exemption rights.⁹⁷ The demand by the debtor must be made seasonably or an appraisal may be refused.⁹⁸ In cases where the exemption is claimed in real estate, the appraisal must be demanded by the debtor before inquisition, where inquisition is required.⁹⁹

Where the demand for an appraisal is required to be made by the creditor, his failure to make a demand operates as a waiver of his rights in regard to the property. In such circumstances the court is not called on to consider the question of value,¹ and it is the duty of the officer to release to the debtor the property claimed to be exempt.² Where the debtor claims that additional exemptions should be allowed him out of his property levied on, it has been held that the appraisal required by the statute does not depend on a demand by the creditor.³

d. Time

The appraisal should be without delay or as soon as it can reasonably be had; and the debtor must hold his property in readiness for appraisal for a reasonable time.

At least where required by statute, the officer must summon appraisers without delay or as soon as it can reasonably be done;⁴ and the debtor must hold his property in readiness for a reasonable time for the purpose of appraisal.⁵ A delay in the making of an appraisal will not defeat the rights of the debtor to an exemption where not the fault of the debtor.⁶

e. Presence of Property

The property should be present when the appraisal is made; it need not be in view of the officer, however, before he appoints the appraisers.

The property should be present when the appraisal is made, and, if it is not present and the debtor is not at fault, he may complain if he has been injured.⁷ The property need not be in view of the officer, however, before he appoints the appraisers; and the fact that the property is in another county will not excuse him from appointing them.⁸

f. Appraisers

Appraisers must be legally appointed. They should not, in the absence of statutory authority, be appointed by the debtor. They should be persons who are disinterested and fitted to determine the value of the property seized, and should be of the statutory number.

The appraisers must be legally appointed, and the appraisal should show that fact.⁹ Appraisers should not be appointed by the debtor, in the absence of a statutory provision permitting such an appointment.¹⁰ Where the statute provides that the debtor and creditor each shall select an appraiser, but either or both of them fail to do so, it becomes appraisers requires the officer to summon appraisers without delay or as soon as it can reasonably be done.

the duty of the officer to select the appraisers himself and to proceed with the appraisalment.¹¹

Qualifications. The appraisers should be persons who are disinterested¹² and who are fitted to determine the value of the property seized.¹³ A statutory requirement that the appraisers shall be summoned from the neighborhood does not contemplate any arbitrary rule of distance or topography; in a city in which a neighborhood covers a smaller space than in the country, a district within a radius of a mile or thereabouts may nevertheless be held to be a neighborhood.¹⁴

Number. The number of appraisers prescribed by statute should be appointed.¹⁵

g. Conduct of Appraisalment; Valuation

The appraisalment should be made in public, and the debtor and creditor and their attorneys are entitled to be present. The appraisers must value the property at its fair market value.

The appraisalment should be made in public,¹⁶ and the debtor,¹⁷ the creditor,¹⁸ and their attorneys¹⁹ are entitled to be present.

Valuation. The appraisers must value the property at its fair market value.²⁰ They have authority to fix a fair value, however, only on property which they can see and at an amount which they can ascertain by inspection and handling.²¹ They are not authorized to consider and adjust equities in the property between an execution debtor and third persons.²² Thus, where mortgaged property is included in the schedule, the appraisers must fix its value without regard to the mortgage.²³

A subsequent sale of the property for more than its appraised value will not invalidate the appraisalment,²⁴ unless the disparity is so great as to furnish ground for presumption of fraud or incompetency on the part of the appraisers.²⁵

h. Return

The appraisers' return should be made to the officer designated in the statute. A return is sufficiently specific, in the absence of a statute to other effect, if it sets out and sufficiently enumerates the different classes of articles and the value of each.

The return of the appraisers should be made to the officer designated by statute, but a return to the wrong officer through inadvertence will not render the appraisal void.²⁶ A return is sufficiently specific if it sets out and sufficiently enumerates the different classes of articles and the value of each,²⁷ unless the statute in terms requires the appraiser to fix a fair valuation on each article, in which case an appraisalment fixing a value, not on separate articles, but on groups containing miscellaneous articles, is defective.²⁸

i. Objections

If the debtor accepts an appraisalment which he deems not to be proper, he waives all imperfections in it and cannot afterward object to it. Opportunity should be given creditors to have an appraisalment to which they object corrected.

If the appraisalment is deemed by the debtor not to be a proper one, he should seek to have it corrected.²⁹ If he accepts it, he waives all imperfections in it and cannot be heard to object to it afterward.³⁰ Opportunity should be given to creditors also to have an appraisalment to which they object corrected; and, where the hearing on the objections of one creditor is postponed by the court to a future day, it is not too late on that day for another creditor to appear and file objections to the schedule of personalty.³¹

j. Confirmation and Setting Aside

The court may set aside an appraisal for cause.

The court has power to set aside an appraisal for cause.³³ If the appraisers were not legally appointed,³⁴ or were not competent to act as such,³⁵ or if the appraisal is manifestly and greatly below the fair market value of the property,³⁶ the appraisal may be set aside. The court is not confined merely to ascertainment of the fairness of the appraisal, however, but may exercise the discretion of a court of equity in the light of all the circumstances of the case. Thus, if property appraised is destroyed without fault of the debtor before approval of the appraisal by the court, and the interests of creditors are not involved, the court may decline to approve the appraisal, so that other property may be retained in place of that destroyed.³⁷

k. Conclusiveness and Effect

The conclusiveness and effect of the appraisal, in the absence of fraud or collusion, rest on the terms of the statute under which it is had.

An appraisal does not necessarily determine whether the property which has been set apart as exempt is lawfully exempt, but that question remains for the determination of the court.³⁸ A creditor who acts on the appraisal as if it were a final adjudication of the debtors' right of exemption therefore runs the risk of so doing.³⁹ However, an appraisal made in the presence of the creditor under circumstances showing an acquiescence by him in the debtor's claim may operate as an estoppel of the creditor later to contest the claim.⁴⁰

The valuation of the appraisers has been held to be conclusive in the absence of fraud or collusion;⁴¹ but there is also authority to the contrary.⁴² A

debtor who, after appraisalment, replevies property claimed to be exempt is bound by the appraised value if the property is exempt; but if the property is not exempt, he cannot claim the advantage of an appraised undervaluation.⁴³

Release of property. It has been held that, if on appraisal the value of the property selected is not greater than the amount which the debtor is entitled to hold as exempt, the officer must release the property to him.⁴⁴

Subsequent execution. An appraisal is not binding on a second execution creditor whose execution did not issue until after appraisal was made; he is entitled to a second appraisal under his own execution.⁴⁵

Disclaimer of title. A disclaimer by the debtor of title to property appraised makes the appraisal inoperative.⁴⁶

l. Costs

The debtor is not required to pay the costs of appraisal unless the statute so provides.

a. In General

A debtor is generally required to select the property which he desires to claim as exempt where he possesses articles some part or some one of which the law exempts, or where the statute exempts property generally to a certain amount and the debtor owns property in excess of that amount, or where an exemption is claimed in lieu of homestead; but a selection is not required unless it will serve a real purpose.

property which he desires to claim as exempt where he possesses articles some part or some one of which the law exempts,⁴⁸ or where the statute exempts property generally to a certain amount and the debtor owns property in excess of that amount,⁴⁹ or where an exemption is claimed in lieu of homestead;⁵⁰ and, if he has had an opportunity to make a selection, but has failed to do so, a levy may be made.⁵¹ A selection is required, however, only when it will serve a real purpose but not where it would be superfluous.⁵² Thus, where the debtor's entire property is within the statutory limit, and all of it is exempt for that reason,⁵³ or where the debtor owns articles specifically exempt only to the number or value fixed by the statute,⁵⁴ no selection is needed and none, therefore, is required.

The debtor may select any particular property seized within the amount allowed by statute,⁵⁵ subject to the condition that the selection shall not be in fraud of the rights of a bona fide creditor.⁵⁶ A selection of property which but for the selection could be subjected by the creditor to his debt, instead of property which he cannot subject to such purpose, is not in fraud of the creditor's rights.⁵⁷

b. Persons Who May Make

Generally speaking, the selection must be made by the debtor, although it may also be made by his agent, clerk, or legal representative, or by one to whom the right to select has been assigned.

Generally speaking, the selection must be made by the debtor,⁵⁸ although it may also properly be made by his agent, clerk, or legal representative,⁵⁹ or by one to whom the right to select has been assigned.⁶⁰ The right to select cannot be conferred on a mortgagee, however, unless the property in question is designated in the mortgage as exempt property and mortgaged as such.⁶¹

c. Time

Under some statutes the debtor, if properly notified or requested, must make his selection before or at the time of levy, under other statutes it has been variously held that the selection may or should be made after summoning of the appraisers, or after filing of the schedule and an appraisal, or at any time before sale.

Under some statutes the debtor, if properly notified or requested by the sheriff, must make his selection before or at the time of the levy.⁶² If a levy is made in the debtor's absence, he may make a selection on his return;⁶³ and, if the debtor is not notified by the officer and requested to make a selection, he may make the selection at the trial⁶⁴ or at any reasonable time before the sale.⁶⁵ Under other statutes it has been variously held that the proper time to make selection is after the appraisers have been summoned,⁶⁶ or that the debtor may postpone making his selection until after the schedule is filed and the appraisal is made,⁶⁷ or that the debtor may make a selection at any time before sale,⁶⁸ but must select before sale.⁶⁹ In any event the debtor is entitled to a reasonable time after notification to make his selection,⁷⁰ and the officer may not demand an immediate selection and, on the debtor's failure to comply immediately with the demand, proceed at once with the sale of property.⁷¹

No particular formalities in the selection of property are necessary,⁷² unless expressly required by statute.⁷³ Any method of selection which the officer cannot, or under the circumstances ought not, misunderstand is sufficient.⁷⁴ The method adopted, however, must amount to a real selection, and not merely to a demand by the debtor of an opportunity to make a selection.⁷⁵ It has been held that the debtor must point out the property to the officer; and it is not sufficient merely to demand property to the statutory amount in general terms.⁷⁶ An objection to a levy on a particular piece of property in question,⁷⁷ a bill of sale of a particular piece of property,⁷⁸ and a motion to the court to discharge money held under a garnishment⁷⁹ have all been held sufficient to constitute a designation or selection by the debtor. Where a certain portion of a mass, the parts of which are not distinguished from each other, is claimed, it is sufficient to select an amount from the mass which will equal the value allowed by the statute.⁸⁰

Appraised values. The selection must be made at appraised values.⁸¹

§ 139. Allotment and Setting Apart

a. In general

b. Proceedings

a. In General

In some jurisdictions an allotment and setting apart to the debtor of specific articles exempt to him are required. He is entitled to have his exemption thus established up to the time of sale. Such a setting apart is not a final adjudication of exemption.

In some jurisdictions an allotment and setting apart to the debtor of specific articles exempt to him are required.⁸⁴ A setting apart has been held to be necessary in order to defeat a sale,⁸⁵ although in at least one jurisdiction in which provision for exemption is made by the constitution such provision is held to protect the debtor before there has been any allotment.⁸⁶

The debtor is entitled to have his exemption thus established up to the time the process is executed by a sale.⁸⁷ The property may be set apart after levy of the execution.⁸⁸ An allotment subsequent to appraisal should not include property which the debtor has consumed after appraisal,⁸⁹ and, where the property has diminished, whether by use, loss, or other cause, after an allotment, the debtor is entitled to have exempted up to the prescribed limit any other personal property which he may have.⁹⁰ On the other hand, one who takes an exemption can have set apart to him only the property owned by him at the time;⁹¹ if property which does not belong to him is wrongfully included in the allotment, property of the same kind cannot later be substituted by him therefor and held as exempt under the allotment.⁹²

Effect. The setting apart of property which the debtor claims to be exempt is a mere identification of the property to which the exemption shall be applied.⁹³ It is not a final adjudication of the debtor's right of exemption, but merely puts the debtor in a position to present his claim to the property, so that it may be awarded to him, provided it appears to the court that he is legally entitled thereto.⁹⁴

b. Proceedings

One who has a right to have property set apart in kind may ordinarily enforce his right. Indeed, the burden of procuring a setting apart is, in at least one jurisdiction, on the debtor. Statutory provisions as to the manner of proceeding should be pursued, but the debtor may waive irregularities therein.

One who has a right to have property set apart in kind may ordinarily enforce his right.⁹⁵ Indeed, the burden of procuring a setting apart is, in at least one jurisdiction, on the debtor.⁹⁶

The provisions of the statutes as to the manner of proceeding should be pursued,⁹⁷ as, for example, provisions that the persons who are to make the allotment should be sworn,⁹⁸ that there should be a descriptive list of the property allotted,⁹⁹ and that the descriptive list should be registered, so that creditors, when they desire to levy their debts, may ascertain what property is exempt.¹

If there is a lien on part of the property, the property on which there is no lien should be allotted first.² Where garnishees are numerous and the amount due from each is small, the proper method of securing the debtor's exemptions is for the officer to appraise and set apart to the debtor such or so much of the claims as he may elect to retain under his exemption.³ Where the statute provides that on appeal from an appraisal on homestead and personal property exemptions the jury shall assess the value of the property embraced therein and the court shall appoint three commissioners to set apart the exemptions in accordance with the verdict of the jury, the commissioners appointed to set apart the exemptions must be guided by the valuation of the jury, whose verdict is final.⁴

Receiver of surplus. Provision has been made by statute for the appointment of a receiver to administer property in excess of the amount of the debtor's exemption for the benefit of his creditors.⁵

from the officer levying an execution the articles set apart by him as exempt.⁶

Appeal. In the absence of a statute providing the method in which the action of commissioners to allot an exemption may be reviewed, it may be reviewed by recordari in the nature of a writ of false judgment.⁷

§ 140. Contest and Hearing

The contest and hearing of a disputed claim for exemptions must be in accordance with the procedure, if any, established by statute.

One claiming an exemption is in general entitled to a determination of his claim, where it is disputed, before the property may be subjected to sale on execution or other process.⁸ Conversely, one who is interested in the property is entitled to oppose a claim of exemption.⁹ The procedure, if any, prescribed by statute for the contesting of claims must be pursued,¹⁰ as, for example, with regard to the necessity of giving an answer to the writ rather than by an exception,^{10.5} with regard to the giving of a bond by the contestant,¹¹ as to the possession of the property pending the contest,¹² as to the filing of an inventory by the contestee,¹³ as to the time of hearing and notice,¹⁴ as to the formation of issues and trial of the contest,¹⁵ and as to the burden of proof.^{15.5} A petition to contest a claim of exemption will be dismissed when it comes after the claim has been approved and allowed by the court and is made merely to discover other assets held by defendant.^{15.10}

15.10 Pa.—Brunwasser v. Dessy, 8 Pa. Dist. & Co.2d 743, 105 Pittsb. Leg.J. 71.

Where the statute makes no provision as to the manner in which a claim of exemption shall be determined, it would seem that the debtor may submit himself to the jurisdiction of the court from which the writ on which it is sought to reach the property was issued and ask that it determine his claim of exemption, or he may notify the officer in possession of the property under the writ of his claim, demand a return of the property, and, in the event of sale, thereafter pursue a remedy provided by statute for such illegal sale; but the court from which the writ issued cannot determine the right to exemption in a summary manner in the absence of a request by, or consent of, the debtor to have the matter so determined.¹⁶

Jurisdiction. By express provision of some statutes a court of equity has jurisdiction to determine whether property claimed to be exempt is so exempt.¹⁷ Under such a statute, if the debtor fails to point out the whole of his personal property or to include a portion thereof in his inventory and conceals it, the jurisdiction of equity may be invoked to ascertain the property omitted, and to determine what property shall be set apart as exempt and pending the proceeding to enjoin the sheriff from setting apart as exempt any personal property which has been levied on.¹⁸

Claim of exemption after order or judgment. Where the issue as to the right of exemption has been tried by a court having jurisdiction of both the subject matter and the person, the debtor by a failure to appeal loses the right to claim exemptions in a second proceeding instituted by him.¹⁹ However, a second application for the exemption of the same property may be made by a wife where the first application made by the husband was dismissed by the court without stating grounds for the dismissal.²⁰

§ 141. Surrender of Other Property

Some statutes provide for the appointment of a trustee to receive and distribute among creditors the portion of the debtor's earnings not exempt.

Provision is sometimes made by statute whereby a debtor whose personal earnings are sought to be subjected to garnishment may apply to the court for the appointment of a trustee to receive and distribute among his creditors the portion of his earnings which are not exempt.²¹ In order to keep the trusteeship alive the debtor must pay such earnings to the trustee as required by the statute; if he fails to do so, the trusteeship terminates without action on the part of the court, creditors whose claims had been filed with the trustee may invoke the usual remedies against such earnings, and the trusteeship can be reinstated only by action of the court on notice to the creditors.²²

§ 142. Successive Exemptions

The filing of a new schedule after the levy of a second execution is required by some statutes. The debtor is entitled ordinarily to but one selection. An exemption may be reallocated after successive executions.

The issuance of an alias writ against the same property has been held not to necessitate the filing of a new schedule.²³ However, some statutes have been held to require the filing of a new schedule after the levy of a second execution;²⁴ and others, although relieving the debtor from filing a new schedule for a fixed period of time after the return of an execution unsatisfied, the length of the period corresponding with the lifetime of the execution, require that a new schedule be filed if additional property is acquired within that period.²⁵ Where a justice's attachment levied on property is quashed, and part of the same property is levied on under the justice's execution on judgment, an exemption list delivered as required by statute has been held to suffice for both writs.²⁶

Successive selections. The debtor is entitled ordinarily to one selection only, which must embrace all the property he is entitled to as exempt,²⁷ but, where the property selected is found, on an ap-

B. REMEDIES AND PROCEDURE TO ENFORCE AND PROTECT

§ 143. Right of Action in General

Where exempt property is wrongfully seized, a right of action arises in favor of the debtor.

Where exempt property is wrongfully seized or sold, a right of action arises in favor of the debtor.³⁰ Whether the property in question is exempt, and hence whether the debtor has a cause of action, must be determined as of the time of the levy.³¹

A magistrate who states to an officer making a levy that a claim for exemption is too late does not thereby become a co-conspirator.³²

§ 144. Nature and Form of Action or Proceeding in General

The nature and form of the various remedies open to a debtor to protect his right of exemption are considered infra §§ 145-154.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 145. Motions and Summary Proceedings

In the absence of statutory authorization, where the facts are not admitted, the court cannot pass in a summary manner on the right to an exemption; such right may be determined on a motion to quash or vacate process directed against property claimed to be exempt.

The debtor may avail himself of a remedy provided by statute for the enforcement or protection, in a summary manner, of his right of exemption;³³ but such a remedy is not exclusive unless the statute so provides.³⁴ In the absence of statutory authorization, where the facts are not admitted, the court cannot assume the prerogative of a jury and pass in a summary manner on the debtor's right to an exemption.³⁵ A contention that the debtor was entitled to an exemption cannot be raised by a motion to modify a judgment in an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance made by him.³⁶

On attachment. The question whether property is exempt from levy and sale may be determined on a motion to quash the levy of an attachment,³⁷ or to discharge the attachment.³⁸ Where, on attachment, property has been sold and the proceeds come into the custody and control of the court, before the attaching officer can lawfully set apart the property as exempt, the debtor must make his claim of exemption to the court.³⁹ An adverse ruling in an attachment proceeding on motion by defendant to have attached property released as exempt does not render the question of exemption res judicata,⁴⁰ the attachment being merely a provisional remedy,⁴¹ and defendant may afterward bring replevin against plaintiff to try the question.⁴²

Where the statutes afford the attachment debtor no opportunity to litigate the question of exemption in the attachment proceedings, it is obvious that an order for the sale of attached property is not a bar to a claim of property as exempt.⁴³ Where, however, defendant is entitled to set up his claim of exemption as a defense to attachment, he cannot claim his exemption after an order of sale of the attached property.⁴⁴ Even in the absence of statute providing for notice, it would seem that attached property should not be released on a claim of exemption by the debtor without notice to the creditor, where the question of exemption is a mixed one of law and fact.⁴⁵

On execution. If an execution is levied on exempt property, the levy may be quashed or vacated on motion in the court from which the execution issued.⁴⁶ So, a release of property as exempt may be ordered⁴⁷ although in the particular jurisdiction mandamus is regarded as a proper remedy to procure the release of such property.⁴⁸

A sale of exempt property may be set aside on motion;⁴⁹ but a levy, or intention to levy, on exempt property is no ground for quashing the writ of execution.⁵⁰

If, under a statute, the court does not have power to quash a levy, the proper remedy for the debtor is to remove the proceeding by certiorari into a court which has that power.⁵¹ A special execution against wages may be vacated on motion.⁵²

Attachment execution. Defendant's right to an exemption cannot be determined on a rule to dissolve an attachment execution.⁵³ Where, in an execution attachment proceeding, the debtor's claim of exemption has been denied at the hearing on the answer of the garnishee, the judgment cannot be questioned by a rule to show cause why the money in court should not be paid to the debtor.⁵⁴

In garnishment proceedings, defendant in the main action may set up a claim of exemption by following the procedure prescribed by statute.⁵⁵

Where money in the hands of a garnishee in which defendant is entitled to an exemption is paid into court, defendant may claim his exemption therein.⁵⁶ Under applicable statutory provisions, an execution defendant may by rule compel a constable to pay over to him exempt wages collected from a garnishee,⁵⁷ and the judgment creditor may be made a party to the rule.⁵⁸ On the other hand, where the garnishee voluntarily pays to the constable money which is exempt, it has been held that in the absence of statute a court may properly refuse to direct the constable to pay the money to the judgment debtor.⁵⁹

§ 146. Replevin or Other Possessory Action

Although there is authority to the contrary effect, as a general rule, a debtor, in the absence of a statute otherwise providing, cannot maintain replevin against an officer to recover exempt property seized by him under valid legal process, or against an execution creditor not in possession of the property; but such an action will lie against the purchaser at an execution sale, and a number of statutes authorize an action of replevin against the officer.

At common law, as shown in Replevin § 27, an execution defendant could not maintain replevin against the officer to recover property seized and held by him under a valid writ; and this principle has been held, both in cases at common law and in cases under statutes not modifying the common-law doctrine, to prevent a debtor from maintaining replevin against an officer to recover exempt property seized by him under valid legal process.⁶⁰ There is, however, authority to the contrary effect,⁶¹ and by statute in a number of jurisdictions, the rule of the common law, as laid down in the authorities denying the right of debtors to bring replevin, has been so far modified as to allow a debtor whose exempt property has been wrongfully seized by an officer, even under valid legal process against him, to recover possession of it by replevin,⁶² or by a proceeding in the nature of replevin known as claim and delivery,⁶³ and these statutes are ordinarily applicable to seizures on attachment as well as on execution.⁶⁴ A statute, however, modifying the common-law rule only to the extent of allowing owners other than defendants in a suit, or debtors in an execution, to bring replevin against the officer, does not impliedly change the common-law rule as to debtors and defendants.⁶⁵

The debtor's right, under the statutes, to replevy exempt property in the hands of an officer is not affected by statutes giving other remedies, in the absence of provision therein that the special remedies given are exclusive,⁶⁶ as, for example, where the statute gives power to a particular court to enjoin the sale of exempt property,⁶⁷ or provides a special remedy for the debtor who desires to retain the property seized under execution and submit his right to it as exempt to the test of a trial.⁶⁸ In any case, to entitle a debtor to maintain replevin to recover exempt property, the right of exemption must be complete, so as to give him the right to immediate possession and make the officer's possession wrongful.⁶⁹

In the absence of a statute otherwise providing, no notice to the officer at the time of the levy that it is exempt, and no demand for its return, are necessary in order to entitle the debtor to maintain replevin;⁷⁰ and a statute providing that an officer is bound to levy on any personal property in the possession of defendant, unless he has received notice in writing from some other person that the property belongs to him, does not require the execution defendant to notify the officer that property levied on belongs to him, before he can maintain

replevin to recover the property as being exempt from execution.⁷¹

Against purchaser at execution sale. The owner of exempt property seized and sold under a writ of execution may maintain replevin against the purchaser at the execution sale,⁷² provided he has not waived his rights.⁷³ It has been held, however, under statutes requiring that exempt property be appraised and set apart, that if the officer disregards the debtor's demand for an appraisal and claim of exemption, and sells the property, replevin will not lie against the purchaser, but the remedy is by an action for damages against the officer, or against both the officer and the execution plaintiff, if the latter directed or participated in the wrong.⁷⁴

Against execution creditor. As a rule, replevin will not lie against an execution creditor who is not in possession of the property, for a person can be sued in replevin only when he has actual or constructive possession and control of the property;⁷⁵ but there is authority for maintenance of such an action against the levying officer and plaintiff in execution.⁷⁶

Veteran's benefits. Benefits payable to a veteran by way of bonds may be replevined from a third party to whom they were given for some honest purpose, although delivery of such possession was by mutual voluntary delivery.^{76.5} ficer jointly, or against the purchaser if he takes and carries away the property.

If a creditor wrongfully directs an officer to levy on and sell exempt property under execution or attachment, or otherwise participates in the wrongful sale, the debtor may maintain an action for damages against him alone⁷⁷ or against him and the officer jointly.⁷⁸ The creditor, without having participated in the levy or sale, may become liable by ratifying the levy, as by receiving its benefits.⁷⁹ The creditor is not, however, liable where there is no showing that he gave the officer an indemnifying bond or directions, or that he received the property or the proceeds thereof, or in some way ratified the officer's acts.⁸⁰ Indeed, it has been said that a creditor does not become liable for the officer's wrongful levy on exempt property merely because he signed an indemnifying bond, if the bond does not direct or authorize a levy on the exempt property,⁸¹ although he is liable as a trespasser in damages if the bond directs the officer to levy on specific property.⁸²

Garnishment. A creditor is liable if he wrongfully obtains by garnishment exempt wages due his debtor and applies them to the satisfaction of his judgment.⁸³ The same rule applies to other exempt choses in action.⁸⁴ However, there is no liability against plaintiff in garnishment if the debtor had a right to assert his claim of exemption in the garnishment proceedings and failed to do so seasonably.⁸⁵

cution is exempt, so that the purchaser acquires no title or right to possession, he is liable to the debtor for damages if he takes and carries away the property.⁸⁶

§ 149. — Against Creditor Proceeding Outside State to Evade Exemption Law

According to a number of authorities, but not others, a creditor is liable for the resulting damage to the debtor where, both being residents of the state, the creditor procures suit to be instituted in a foreign state in order to evade the state exemption laws, even though such evasion is not prohibited by statute.

While there is authority to the contrary effect,⁸⁷ according to a number of authorities a creditor is liable for the resulting damage to the debtor where, both being residents of the state, the creditor procures suit to be instituted in a foreign state for the purpose of depriving the debtor of the exemptions which he would have had were he sued in the state of his residence, even where no statute exists prohibiting the sending of a claim outside the state for the purpose of evading the exemption law thereof.⁸⁸ However, by express statutory provision in some jurisdictions, a right of action is given the debtor,⁸⁹ which may be exercised unless no effort was made in the foreign state by attachment or garnishment to deprive the debtor of his statutory exemptions.^{89.5} Where the statute makes the sending of the claim out of the state a criminal offense and punishable as such, but does not in express terms give an action for damages, it is held, nevertheless, that the debtor may maintain an action for damages against a creditor who violates the statute.⁹⁰

Such an action cannot be defeated on the ground that the right of exemption is res judicata, where plaintiff was not a party to the proceedings in the other state.⁹¹

§ 150. — Form of Action

Where the common-law forms of action have been abolished, an action to recover for the wrongful seizure and sale of exempt property is simply an action for damages; under common-law rules, trespass, case, trover, and assumpsit are appropriate forms of action.

Where the common-law forms of action have been abolished, an action to recover for the wrongful seizure and sale of exempt property is simply an action for damages.⁹²

Trespass is a proper form of action to recover damages from a creditor who directs or otherwise participates in a wrongful seizure and sale of exempt property;⁹³ and the action may be maintained against the purchaser at an execution sale for taking and carrying away the property, if it was exempt so that no title passed.⁹⁴

An action on the case will lie against a creditor for directing a levy on exempt property.⁹⁵

An action of trover may be maintained for the purpose of recovering damages for the seizure and sale of exempt property, on the theory that the seizure and sale amount to a conversion.⁹⁶

Possessory warrant is, in a proper case, a remedy for the recovery of property from one having unlawful possession.^{96.5}

Assumpsit. If an officer or creditor wrongfully obtains exempt wages or other exempt money due to a debtor by garnishment proceedings, the debtor may waive the tort at common law and sue in assumpsit for money had and received.⁹⁷

Cross action; reconvention. Where exempt property has been attached, defendants may by a plea in reconvention assert the right to a judgment against the attachment plaintiff for the value of the property levied on, treating the levy as a conversion.⁹⁸ By such a cross action for conversion, defendant abandons the property to plaintiff.⁹⁹

§ 151. Action for Penalties

Under a statute so providing, a debtor may maintain an action for a penalty against any person taking or seizing exempt property; but such a statute will be applied according to its terms, and the debtor may waive his rights thereunder.

Under a statute so providing, the debtor may maintain an action to recover a penalty against any person taking or seizing exempt property.¹ The debtor, however, may waive such a statute and proceed only for simple damages.² If the debtor transfers his property after it has become subject to the lien of an execution against him, he cannot afterward claim the property as his and recover the statutory penalty.³

A statute in terms rendering the officer alone liable to such a penalty for seizing and selling exempt property does not authorize an action therefor against the execution creditor, although he may have directed the levy;⁴ and, since penal statutes are to be strictly construed, a statute imposing a penalty of triple damages for carrying off and destroying any "wood, timber, lumber, hay, grass, or other personal property" does not apply to a case in which property not of the same kind as that enumerated has been taken.⁵

§ 152. Remedies in Equity

In the absence of statutory authority, an equity court will not assume jurisdiction to protect an exemption when there is a plain and adequate remedy at law.

Courts of equity may by statute be clothed with full and complete jurisdiction over the question of exemptions allowed by the constitution and laws,⁶ not only to adjudicate as to the rights of the parties thereto, but to restrain interference therewith or sale thereof under any inhibited process of law and to pass on the propriety of any exemption set apart by any officer and to rectify it if improper.⁷ In the absence of such a statute, the question of jurisdiction is governed by the general principle that equity will not assume jurisdiction when there is a plain and adequate remedy at law.⁸

A claim of exemption irregularly made cannot be enforced in equity.⁹

§ 153. — Injunction Generally

Authorities differ as to whether a debtor can maintain a bill in equity to enjoin an officer from selling his exempt property. The statute, or circumstances rendering the legal remedy inadequate, may make injunction a proper remedy.

Under some authorities, a debtor cannot maintain a bill in equity to enjoin an officer from selling his exempt property on execution or other process, for he generally has an adequate remedy at law by motion to quash the levy or set aside the sale, or by an action to recover the property or to recover damages.¹⁰ Other authorities hold that when a debtor duly claims his exemption, and the officer is proceeding to sell in disregard of his right, injunction is a proper remedy,¹¹ and a wrongful sale of exempt property under execution will be enjoined even though the property has been returned to its owner on a delivery bond;¹² and, in some cases where the question of jurisdiction has not been raised, an injunction has been granted.¹³ This remedy may be expressly given by statute.¹⁴

Independently of statute, an injunction will be granted where the circumstances are such as to render the remedy at law inadequate;¹⁵ so, proceedings on an execution may be enjoined where, if they should result in a sale of plaintiff's real estate, an apparent cloud would be placed on the title to the property.¹⁶ Alias executions against exempt property repeatedly procured for the sole purpose of annoying a judgment debtor will be enjoined.¹⁷

Bond. The court may, in its discretion, require a bond as a condition precedent to the issuance of an injunction.¹⁸

propriates exempt property or money, the court which granted the injunction has the power to render a judgment against him and in favor of the debtor for the amount so appropriated.¹⁹

§ 154. — Injunction against Proceedings in Another State

Equity will enjoin a resident creditor from instituting or prosecuting proceedings in another state for the purpose of evading the exemption laws of his state and of subjecting to the satisfaction of his claim property of the debtor which would be exempt if the proceedings were brought within the state.

It may be regarded as settled that a court of equity will enjoin a resident creditor from instituting or prosecuting an action or proceeding in another state for the purpose of evading the exemption laws of his state and of collecting his claim by subjecting to its satisfaction property or credits which the debtor could claim as exempt if the action or proceeding were brought within the state;²⁰ so, the sending of a claim out of the state in violation of a criminal statute will be enjoined.²¹ Where a person himself carries his claim into a foreign state and there sues thereon, it has been held that he thereby transfers his claim within the meaning of the statute.^{21.5}

The same doctrine applies where the debtor takes his property into another state, for a temporary purpose, and under such circumstances it is held that the creditor who also lives in the state of the debtor's domicile cannot attach property in the foreign state and thereby evade the exemption laws to the benefit of which the debtor is entitled;²² but where the attached property is temporarily in the foreign state, the court of equity will not interfere unless it appears from the relations and circumstances of the parties that it would be inequi-

table to permit the institution or continuance of the foreign action or proceeding.²³

The court, in issuing an injunction, proceeds in personam against the creditor to compel him to obey the laws of his own state,²⁴ and in so doing it does not violate the provision of the federal constitution that in each state full faith and credit shall be given to the judicial proceedings of every other state.²⁵ Such an injunction suit is not within the rule that the courts of one state cannot enjoin the proceedings of a court in another state, for the injunction merely acts on the personal conduct of the creditor who is within the jurisdiction of the court.²⁶

An injunction will not be granted in such cases on the mere showing that the property is exempt and without any showing as to the debtor's inability to pay, or his possession of none save exempt property, or as to whether the debt was, or was not, fraudulently contracted.²⁷ It is only when a creditor attempts to evade the exemption laws of his own state by resort to attachment proceedings in the court of another state against the property of a debtor who is a resident of the state of the creditor's domicile that he will be enjoined by the courts of the latter state from prosecuting his suit in the foreign jurisdiction;²⁸ and when a creditor sues in his own state to collect a claim against a nonresident debtor by garnishment, subjecting to its payment money due to such nonresident in the hands of the garnishee who is within the creditor's state, which would be exempt under the laws of the debtor's state, there cannot be said to be an attempt to evade the exemption laws of another state.²⁹ This rule is also placed on the ground that, inasmuch as equity acts only in personam, an injunction will not issue against a creditor in an-

§ 155. Defenses

Matters involving the existence of a right of exemption, or waiver or forfeiture of such right, or estoppel to assert it, which matters may be urged as defenses to proceedings to enforce and protect such rights, are considered in appropriate preceding sections of this Title.

§ 156. — Set-Off of Debt or Judgment of Creditor

A judgment against a defendant for the value of exempt property cannot be offset by a debt owing from the plaintiff to the defendant.

A judgment against a defendant for the value of plaintiff's exempt property improperly taken cannot be offset by a debt owing from plaintiff to defendant.³¹

§ 157. Jurisdiction

Jurisdiction to hear and determine questions relating to exemption rights may be conferred on a particular court. In the absence of a statute otherwise providing, an action to replevy exempt property taken under legal process, or a bill to enjoin a sale of exempt property under such process, need not be brought in the court from which the process issued.

Jurisdiction to hear and determine all questions relating to exemption rights may be conferred by statute on a particular court.³² Whenever the jurisdiction of the court of equity attaches, it should be retained and exercised to determine finally the rights involved under the issues made.³³ Where, on a motion in a court of law to quash a levy on exempt property, the creditor relies on an equitable lien to defeat the motion and the debtor sets up matter which is cognizable only in equity, the creditor may be allowed to elect whether to withdraw his objections to the jurisdiction of the court of law or to have the levy quashed without prejudice to his remedy in equity.³⁴

In the absence of a statute otherwise providing, an action of replevin to recover exempt property taken under legal process need not be brought in the court from which the process issued, but may be brought in any court having jurisdiction;³⁵ and a similar rule applies to a bill for an injunction to prevent a sale under legal process;³⁶ but where the statute provides that from the time of the issuance of an order of attachment the court shall be deemed to have acquired jurisdiction and have control of all subsequent proceedings under the attachment, the only court which has jurisdiction to determine whether an attachment should be discharged because of a claim that the property taken is exempt is the court from which the attachment issues.³⁷

Title is generally necessary to support an action for damages for seizing or selling exempt property, or to recover it; and ordinarily only the debtor may maintain such an action, although his wife may be permitted to do so, as where he fails to assert his right or the exemption right was created for her benefit.

As a general rule, title is necessary to support an action to recover property as exempt or to recover damages for wrongfully seizing or selling it,³⁸ and ordinarily, and with exceptions which will appear, no one but the debtor himself can maintain such an action.³⁹ Possession at the time of the seizure is necessary to support trespass,⁴⁰ but a constructive possession is sufficient.⁴¹

Action by husband. A debtor may sue in his own name to recover his exempt property, or damages for its seizure or sale, without joining his wife as a plaintiff, although the statute may give the exemption for the benefit of both,⁴² and he holds the recovery, if any, for the use of his wife and children.^{42.5}

Action by wife. The wife of an execution or attachment debtor may bring an action to enforce a right of exemption created for her benefit⁴³ or for the benefit of the family.⁴⁴ Under a statute so providing, an action may be brought by the wife of an execution or attachment defendant, if he is absent, or if he fails or refuses to assert his right,⁴⁵ or if he has died.⁴⁶

Where the action is given to the wife by statute, even though it is her husband's exemption which she claims, her right is not defeated by her husband's waiver.⁴⁷ In a statutory proceeding limited to the trial of title or right of possession, a wife cannot assert her right of exemption in community property levied on by attachment in a suit against the husband.⁴⁸

Under a statute allowing a firm, as such, to claim an exemption out of the partnership property, and a statute allowing the wife of a debtor to claim his exemptions when he fails or refuses to do so, the wife of a partner may assert his right to the partnership exemption, if he fails or refuses to do so.⁴⁹

Husband and wife may sue jointly for damages for seizure of the exempt property.⁵⁰

Action by partner. Where exemptions are allowed to the partners in partnership property, one partner may maintain trover against the officer for the seizure of exempt property of the firm under an execution against all, since the exemption is held to be an individual right.⁵¹

A mortgagor of exempt personal property who is rightfully in possession when it is wrongfully attached or taken on execution may maintain an action for damages,⁵² notwithstanding an attachment constitutes a breach of the condition of the mortgage,⁵³ or although the mortgage is to secure a debt payable on demand, if it contains a clause giving the mortgagor the right to possession until default in payment, and there has been no demand for payment, and therefore no default.⁵⁴ It has been held that the mortgagee should be joined as a party in an action against the officer for damages, lest the officer be subjected to a double liability.⁵⁵

A purchaser of exempt property from an execution defendant may maintain an action for a subsequent levy and sale.⁵⁶ The grantor and grantee of land which the former was entitled to claim as exempt from execution may join in a complaint against creditors of the former, the former to have his right to exemption established and the latter to have his title quieted.⁵⁷

Intervention. In particular circumstances, a petition for leave to intervene as an interested party has been denied.^{57.5}

b. Defendants

The creditor is a proper party defendant, and may be sued separately or jointly with the officer where the latter is also liable; and the purchaser of property sold subject to the right of exemption, subsequently allowed, is a proper party defendant in an action for damages.

While the sheriff, as appears in Sheriffs and Constables §§ 66, 87, may be held liable in an action for the wrongful seizure or sale of exempt property, he is not a proper party defendant to a bill in equity brought to restrain the sale of exempt property.⁵⁸ The creditor is a proper party defendant and may be sued either separately⁵⁹ or jointly with the officer in those cases where the officer also is liable.⁶⁰ The purchaser of exempt property sold at a judicial sale subject to the right of exemption, pending an application by the debtor for an exemption which is subsequently allowed, is a proper party defendant in an action to recover damages.⁶¹

§ 159. Pleading

A debtor seeking to enforce or protect his right to exemption must plead facts which entitle him to relief. Facts constituting a defense must be pleaded by answer.

A debtor seeking to enforce or protect his right to exemption must show by his pleadings facts which entitle him to relief,⁶² and ownership in the property must be averred.⁶³ The debtor must show by his pleadings that he has taken all the steps required of him by the statute for claiming and defining his rights;⁶⁴ he is not, however, required to set forth his schedule,⁶⁵ and need not anticipate defenses.⁶⁶

While it has been held that in replevin to recover exempt property taken under legal process it is not necessary to designate specifically the character of the property as exempt, any more than in an action of trespass or trover,⁶⁷ it has also been held, in a suit to enjoin the seizure or sale of exempt property, that the debtor must plead his right of exemption.⁶⁸ Whenever it is necessary to plead a right of exemption the facts and conditions fulfilling the statutory requirements for the existence of an exemption must be distinctly alleged,⁶⁹ and a mere allegation that property is exempt is insufficient;⁷⁰ but it is not necessary to make the allegations more specific than required by statute, or to carry the statement of facts beyond the statutory requirements.⁷¹

If residence within the jurisdiction is a condition of the exemption right, the residence must be pleaded.⁷² An averment of residence is a sufficient averment of citizenship.⁷³

If the exemption is given by statute to a householder or housekeeper,⁷⁴ or to the head of a family,⁷⁵ or to a member of the family,⁷⁶ the allegations must cover this prerequisite.

Damages or penalty. The usual rule that special damages must be alleged obtains.⁷⁷ A debtor seeking to recover a statutory penalty in double the amount of the property seized for the seizure of exempt property must declare specially on the statute,⁷⁸ and if he declares only in the common form of an action of trespass, without reference to the statute, he thereby waives the penalty and can recover single damages only.⁷⁹

Election between exemptions. Where a claimant is in reasonable doubt as to which of two exemptions he is entitled, or in what capacity he should claim, he may plead both exemptions, although he can have only one, and he cannot be required by the court to allege on which exemption he will stand.⁸⁰

Defenses. Facts constituting a defense must be pleaded by answer and not by demurrer;⁸¹ thus, if a waiver of exemption is relied on as a defense, it must be pleaded.⁸²

An admission by the creditor's pleadings, to be conclusive against him on the issue of the validity of the debtor's claim to exemptions, must be an admission of the existence of all of the necessary elements of the exemption right.⁸³

Departure. The general rule that, where a plaintiff declares at common law and later in his replication takes his position on a statute, there is a departure has no application to a case where plaintiff declares in trespass for an illegal seizure of his property and defendant sets up as a defense that he was an officer and seized the goods under execution and plaintiff replies that he was entitled to a claim of exemption under the provisions of the ex-

On motion to quash attachment. To present the question of exemption on motion to quash the levy of an attachment, no pleadings are ordinarily necessary other than the notice stating the grounds on which the motion to quash the levy is based.⁸⁵ It has been held that no answer or other pleading is required or allowed controverting the motion.⁸⁶

A petition for certiorari attacking the levy of execution on purported exempt property must allege a state of facts which, if proved to be true, will entitle the petitioner to the relief sought.^{86.5} So, where there is a levy on property not expressly exempt by statute, it must be alleged that the officer making the levy has been informed of the debtor's election to include such property as a part of the aggregate exemption authorized by the statute; and if the exemption is given by statute to the head of a family, the allegations must cover this prerequisite.^{86.10}

§ 160. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

Generally, the burden is on him who seeks to enforce or establish an exemption; so, he has the burden of showing, among other things, that he is within the classes entitled to the exemption, that the property is of the type exempted, and that he has taken the required steps to establish his right.

As a general rule, in an action or proceeding to enforce or establish an exemption right, the burden is on him who seeks to enforce or establish it,⁸⁷ although there is authority, in some cases based on statute, to the effect that, if the debtor's claim to exemption is duly made and filed, it is prima facie correct, and the onus of establishing the contrary is on the creditor.⁸⁸ The burden is on claimant to show any requisite ownership of the property in question.⁸⁹

On a motion to discharge an attachment levy, the party making the motion must establish the existence of the grounds for exemption by competent evidence,⁹⁰ and show that the property was claimed as exempt at the time of the levy.⁹¹ Where the attaching creditor, in his affidavit for an attachment, sets up facts which if not controverted would entitle the debtor to an exemption in the property attached and alleges further facts depriving debtor of such exemption, the burden is on him, if such facts are denied, to show that they exist.⁹²

In garnishment proceedings, the burden has been held to be on the garnishee or the debtor to establish that the amount due from the garnishee is exempt from liability for the obligations of the debtor;⁹³ but there is authority, in some cases based on statute, to the effect that the burden of proving the absence of exemption is on the creditor.⁹⁴ Where the amount reached in the hands of an employer as wages due the debtor is less than the amount specifically exempt to him as earnings within a specified time prior to the levy, there is no presumption that sums previously paid the debtor by his employer within the statutory period are in his possession or that they have been used, or are still available, for the support of his family.⁹⁵

It is presumed that a guardian made disbursements from nonexempt, rather than from exempt, funds.⁹⁶ It will not be presumed that the property of a debtor was the same before and after bankruptcy.⁹⁷

Status of claimant as person entitled to exemption. The burden is on claimant to show that he is within one of the classes of persons protected by the statute,⁹⁸ as, for example, that he is head of a family or a householder,⁹⁹ or one engaged in an occupation protected by the statute,¹ or a resident, where the statute requires residence,² or a citizen, where it requires citizenship,³ or, if the statute so requires, that he is not the owner of a homestead.⁴

When a person claiming the benefit of the exemption laws shows that he was a resident of the state at a certain time, it will be presumed that his residence therein continued until the opposite party shows that it has been lost;⁵ the mere fact that he has gone to another state and engaged in business there is not alone sufficient to rebut the presumption.⁶ Under a statute restricting exemption rights to citizens, a presumption of citizenship arises when the fact of residence is pleaded and proved.⁷

The presumption is that the husband is the head of the family,⁸ and if the wife claims an exemption as such head, she must show the circumstances entitling her to the benefit of the law.⁹

Nature, character, and value of property. The burden is on the debtor to prove that the property claimed as exempt is within the statute;¹⁰ thus, the burden is on the debtor to prove that the articles claimed as exempt are necessary for a stated purpose, where the exemption is so limited,¹¹ unless the article is of such character as to give rise to a presumption of necessity.¹²

When it is necessary, under the statute, that furniture and household goods, or other property shall, to be exempt, be kept and used by the debtor and his family, or used by the debtor in his business or for a particular purpose, the burden is on the debtor to show affirmatively that they were so kept and used,¹³ and the debtor must go further and prove that the property taken was used habitually for earning his living, where a statutory requirement of habitual use is imposed.¹⁴ No presumption of loss of exemption arises against the owner of tools or instruments necessary to conduct his trade, business, or profession by which he earns his living because of the temporary nonuse of such chattel for any reason.^{14.5}

In order to maintain a claim to chattels which is founded solely on the contention that they are the product or increment of duly exempted personalty, it is incumbent on claimant to prove affirmatively that the subject matter of the claim was obtained in exchange for exempted property or the proceeds thereof or by labor exerted in connection with the use or consumption of such property, so that the newly acquired personalty might with fairness and reason be said to take the place of that which has been set apart.¹⁵ Where money due under a policy of insurance on exempt property is claimed as exempt, the burden is on the debtor to show that the property insured was exempt.¹⁶ Where pension money, when converted into other property, is to a certain extent exempt, the fact of investment and the values of purchased and exchanged properties must be established by the person asserting the exemption.¹⁷ A person claiming real estate as exempt, because bought with pension money, must prove the right claimed, as inspection of the property or of the records will not determine whether it is exempt or not.¹⁸

Where the statute limits the value of the property that may be claimed as exempt, the debtor must show affirmatively that property claimed by him as exempt does not exceed such value.¹⁹ The

Circumstances not rebutting presumption

(1) The presumption that, where the husband, wife, and children are living together, the husband is the head of the family is not rebutted by proof that the wife is the owner of the premises on which they live.
Ill.—Clinton v. Kidwell, 82 Ill. 427.

(2) It is not enough to show that she carries on business on her own account, and that her husband works for her therein, but it must be shown that he has abdicated or forfeited his headship and control of the family, and that she has assumed it.

burden is on plaintiff to prove that the value of all his tools, including the one for the seizure of which he brings trover, does not exceed the statutory limit.²⁰ It has been held, however, that, where the debtor has a specific exemption on household goods to a certain amount, he needs to prove, in an action to recover such property, which has been levied on, only that it is not worth more than the statutory limit, and that it is not necessary for him to show that he does not own any other property.²¹

Nature of claim against which exemption is asserted. The burden is on the debtor to show that the debt against which the claim of exemption is made is a debt as against which an exemption may be claimed.²² According to one view, the claimant of an exemption must show that the debt against which it is claimed arose subsequently to the enactment of the constitutional or statutory provision conferring the right to the exemption;²³ according to another, where the creditor claims the right to seize the property on the ground that the debt accrued prior to the enactment of the exemption law, he must show such fact.²⁴

Where the debt sued on is for the purchase price, the burden is on the creditor to show this fact, in order to take the case out of the exemption.²⁵ Where the debt is for the purchase price of goods which have been mingled with other goods, according to one view it is incumbent on the creditor to separate those goods against which an exemption cannot be claimed,²⁶ while a contrary view imposes the duty of selection on the debtor.²⁷

Waiver or forfeiture of exemption; laches. A waiver by a debtor of his right of exemption will not be presumed, but must be affirmatively proved,²⁸ and the burden rests on the creditor to establish the fact of waiver²⁹ or forfeiture,³⁰ or of laches in making the claim.³¹ Where there is no evidence that any harm was caused by delay in making the claim, it is the duty of the creditor to show that the delay alleged by him was unreasonable,³² and where it does not appear that the debtor was notified of his rights of exemption by the officer levying on the property, it will not be presumed that he waived his rights, although he did not assert them until long after the levy.³³

A written waiver "of all rights of exemption and homestead" contained in a promissory note will be presumed to refer only to exemptions allowed by the law of the state where the note was made.³⁴ If one draws a bill of exchange on his employer, who owes him only for wages, the presumption is that he waives his right of exemption before acceptance.³⁵

An agreement or special contract whereby the proceeds of life insurance policies may, under a statute, be made subject to creditors' claims must be shown by clear and satisfactory evidence.³⁶

Proceedings to protect exemption right. Claimant has the burden of showing that he has fulfilled statutory requirements as to steps to be taken to obtain his exemption, such as demand and furnishing a schedule.³⁷ The burden is on the debtor to show a claim and selection of the property as exempt, when required;³⁸ but a claim may be presumed under proper circumstances.³⁹ Presumptions may be indulged as to jurisdiction of the ordinary granting the exemption,⁴⁰ and of the regularity of proceedings.⁴¹

The creditor has the burden of showing that property which he seeks to reach has been acquired subsequently to the filing of a schedule.⁴² Where the statute provides the mode of contest to a claim of exemption and provides that the claim shall be

Evasion of exemption law. In an action for damages for the sending of a claim out of the state to evade the exemption law, the right of exemption, if controverted, must be established by plaintiff.⁴⁴

§ 161. Admissibility of Evidence

Any relevant, competent, and material evidence is admissible in a proceeding to enforce the exemption right.

Subject to the rules applicable in civil proceedings generally, any relevant, competent, and material evidence is admissible in a proceeding to enforce the exemption right,⁴⁵ as, for example, evidence as to the possession of other property by claimant,⁴⁶ admissions by the debtor on a former examination,⁴⁷ the status of the debtor,⁴⁸ the value of the property,⁴⁹ or as to a waiver.⁵⁰ Incompetent, irrelevant, or immaterial evidence is not admissible.⁵¹

Evidence to justify the suing out of the attachment is inadmissible where the issue is as to any legal levy on exempt property.⁵² A debtor who before sale demands the return of his property as exempt and objects at the sale on the same ground and sues the sheriff and the purchaser for its return cannot show at the trial that the sale is void on other grounds.⁵³

The transfer of the claim to a resident of another state and circumstances attendant on the transfer are evidence tending to show the intent with which the transfer was made.⁵⁴

Defendant's testimony on direct examination as to amounts spent by him for food and other necessities was not sufficiently shaken by his admissions, on cross-examination, that he kept no exact book account of his expenditures and that such amounts were based on best estimates he could make, to require re-to the character of property is not necessary where, by the evidence adduced and the inferences which the jury is entitled to draw therefrom, its character is shown.⁵⁶ Where the only evidence in the case is that all property was included in the schedule, exemption cannot be denied on mere suspicion that the schedule was incomplete.⁵⁷ The institution of a suit in another state has been declared only prima facie evidence of evasion of the exemption laws of the state of the forum.⁵⁸

If a party's testimony is in conflict with his affidavit, his testimony will control the affidavit.⁵⁹

§ 163. Trial and Hearing

In the adjudication of a debtor's efforts to enforce and protect his right to exemption, controverted questions of fact, such as the status of the debtor and the character or use of the property, are for the jury; but the construction of the statute under which the exemption is claimed is a question of law for the court.

A mere question of law as to the right of a party to an exemption should not be made the subject of a jury trial.⁶⁰ On exceptions to the appraisal, an execution creditor cannot, where the facts are not admitted, have the right of the debtor to an exemption summarily determined without the intervention of a jury unless the statute so provides.⁶¹ Where no specific method of procedure is fixed by statute, it would seem that the judge may hear the issue arising on a traverse of defendant's affidavit claiming property in the hands of a garnishee as exempt without the intervention of a jury.⁶² When an applicant for exemption presents a schedule, the creditor who attacks it is entitled to open and close before a jury.⁶³

Where no evidence to support the exemption claim is presented, a verdict for the creditor should be directed or the claim should be nonsuited.⁶⁴ The court may postpone to the final hearing an application by one claiming an exemption in a judgment in his favor as to which a writ of garnishment has issued and as to a claim for personal property not actually levied on.⁶⁵ An issue as to whether property is exempt should be determined at a hearing on the merits and not on a motion to dissolve an order restraining the execution sale of the property.⁶⁶

Instructions should follow strictly the requirements of the statute,⁶⁷ and must be based on evidence in the case.⁶⁸ The court should grant properly requested instructions where their submission is justified.^{68.5}

Questions of law and fact. Where a trial is to a jury, questions of fact on which there is conflicting evidence are for the jury.⁶⁹ The construction of the statute under which the exemption is jection of such direct testimony by trial court as trier of facts.

Cal.—Sanker v. Humborg, 119 P.2d 433, 48 C.A.2d 205.

Averments of affidavit

(1) In absence of countervailing evidence, averment of affidavit in attachment that property sought to be attached was not exempt from execution was sufficient to sustain plaintiff's burden of sustaining attachment by greater weight of evidence.

Ohio.—Ahlgren & Son v. Wolf, 29 N.E.2d 436, 65 Ohio App. 172.

(2) Where the statute provides that the personal earnings of the debtor cannot in garnishment be applied to the payment of his debts when it is made to appear by the debtor's affidavit or otherwise that such earnings are necessary for the maintenance of his family, the debtor's affidavit is sufficient evidence prima facie of all of the facts properly set forth therein.

claimed is clearly a question of law for the court,⁷⁰ and a court cannot delegate this duty to the jury by instructing them that it is their duty, under the law, to construe the exemption law liberally toward the debtor.⁷¹ So, where the question whether the occupation or status of a debtor is such as to entitle him to the benefit of the statute depends merely on a construction of the statute, the question is one of law for the court;⁷² but where his status or occupation is disputed, and the question is as to what is his status or occupation, it is one of fact for the jury.⁷³

Questions as to whether a person claiming an exemption is engaged in a particular occupation,⁷⁴ whether he "habitually" earns his living by a particular occupation,⁷⁵ and whether the occupation in which the debtor is engaged is his principal occupation,⁷⁶ are questions of fact for the jury. Whether the debtor is a wage earner within the meaning of the exemption law,⁷⁷ whether the relations between the members of a group are such as to make it a family within the meaning of the statute,⁷⁸ and whether the debtor bears such a relation to the family as to make him its head,⁷⁹ are mixed questions of law and fact, and should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions.

The character of particular articles, when in dispute, is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury.⁸⁰ Whether particular articles are such as may be regarded as "necessary" is ordinarily a question of fact;⁸¹ so, whether tools are necessary for upholding life or to carry on a trade or business may be a question of fact for the jury,⁸² but whether they are exempt is generally a mixed question of law and fact,⁸³ although it has been held that when the facts are undisputed the court may decide whether a particular implement is a necessary tool of a trade.⁸⁴

Except in a clear case, it is a question of fact for the jury whether property claimed as exempt is "suitable" to the debtor's "condition or occupation in life," under a statute exempting property in those terms.⁸⁵ If a particular article is such that it could not under any circumstances be regarded as requisite for the comfort or convenience of the debtor, or if it clearly does not come within the class exempted by the statute, the court may hold as a matter of law that it is not exempt;⁸⁶ on the other hand, if an article comes within the class exempted by the statute, it is to be held as a matter of law that it is exempt, and it is not for the jury to say whether it is necessary in the particular case or not.⁸⁷

Where an exemption depends on use made of property claimed to be exempt, whether such use has been made is a question for the jury;⁸⁸ what constitutes actual use is a question of fact to be determined on competent evidence,⁸⁹ as is the question whether a debtor uses particular property, such as tools, or a team, etc., or habitually uses them, to earn his living.⁹⁰

The question whether an exemption has been waived, being one of intention, has been held to be a question of fact for the jury, where the facts are not conclusive on the question of intention.⁹¹ It is for the jury to determine what is a reasonable time within which to claim exemption,⁹² or to select property,⁹³ or to reinvest the proceeds of property,⁹⁴ and whether a transfer by claimant of property claimed to be exempt is in fact a sale which would operate to defeat claimant's right, or a mortgage as a pledge for borrowed money, which would not operate to defeat claimant's exemption right.⁹⁵

Forfeiture of exemption by abandonment of trade⁹⁶ or by fraudulent transfer or concealment, in jurisdictions in which it is held that fraud operates as a forfeiture,⁹⁷ is a mixed question of law and fact.

The good faith of the creditor in assigning his claim to a person in another state is a question for the jury.⁹⁸

Verdict and findings. A special finding as to the value of property claimed as exempt should contain facts which would make the aggregate value of the specific property a matter of computation and not of conjecture.⁹⁹ In a state where the term "homestead" includes both realty and personalty, on an issue before the jury as to whether applicant is entitled to a homestead and exemption, a finding of "homestead" for applicant means the entire realty and personalty in issue.¹

An order enjoining a sale of exempt property is not defective because it does not have a seal attached,² or is based on an application with which the supporting affidavit was combined in one document.³ An exception to an order sustaining the debtor's claim to an exemption is not a prerequisite to a motion to vacate the order.⁴

Rehearing. A creditor's motion to rehear a claim of exemption in a suit granted by default is within the discretion of the court,^{4,5} which can prescribe such terms as are just.^{4,10} Where a judgment

debtor's claim to an exemption was established by default and the creditor had, by fraud, obtained possession of attached wages from the employer of the judgment debtor, it was held that the court could properly refuse to entertain the creditor's motion for a rehearing on the exemption claim until the creditor had restored the money to the employer.^{4,15}

§ 164. Judgment, Review, and Costs

General rules as to judgments and review in civil actions have been applied in actions for the enforcement or protection of the right to exemption.

A particular exemption statute has been said to contemplate that in determining a claim of exemption a judgment shall be made.^{4,50}

The court cannot render judgment on facts not pleaded,⁵ but in this connection pleadings are not to be strictly or literally interpreted.⁶ Where plaintiff's property is exempt from execution on defendant's judgment, a judgment in an action to enforce the exemption may properly direct that the recovery of defendant's judgment against plaintiff be indorsed to the effect that it is not a lien on the property of plaintiff which is found to be exempt.⁷ When goods levied on to satisfy a judgment are claimed as exempt and replevied on that ground, defendant in replevin is entitled to a judgment from the excess of the value of the goods over the amount exempt by law, not exceeding the amount of his judgment and costs.⁸

The trial court authorizing the release of exempted property from attachment has the obligation to supervise recovery of the property by the debtor.^{8,5}

Review. A particular exemption statute has been held to contemplate that an appeal will lie from

Judgment rather than order

In statute regarding hearings on claims for exemption from execution after levy, wherein it is provided that court shall give judgment determining whether claim shall be allowed and copy of judgment shall be forwarded to levying officer, who shall hold goods until judgment becomes final, use of term "judgment" is precise rather than general, and determination of adverse claim is in fact a judgment rather than an order. judgments determining a claim of exemption.^{8.10} After a cause has reached the appellate court, it is too late either to urge⁹ or to attack¹⁰ a claim of exemption, for the first time; and an exemption cannot be attacked in the appellate court on grounds not presented at the trial.¹¹ An exception must have been taken to the court's ruling on a claim for exemption in order that an assignment of error on that ground may be sustained;¹² and an objection to the form of the judgment cannot be made for the first time on appeal, for the judgment is amendable in the court which rendered it.¹³

The rule that an appellate court will not disturb a finding on conflicting testimony¹⁴ or for harmless error¹⁵ obtains. Where a justice denies the debtor's claim of exemption, and the debtor appeals to the circuit court without bond, the creditors may sell the property and, if it is shown to be exempt, they are bound to reimburse the debtor.¹⁶

The measure of damages for a wrongful interference with exempt property is the actual injury sustained; it is the value of the property if it is sold, or the value of its use while detained, if it is restored to the debtor available for use. In proper circumstances, damages for injury to plaintiff's business, or exemplary damages, may be allowed.

As a general rule, the actual injury sustained from a wrongful interference with exempt property constitutes the measure of damages thereon;¹⁷ and in the absence of evidence of actual damage plain-tiff's recovery is confined to nominal damages.¹⁸ So, when such property has been wrongfully levied on and sold or otherwise converted, as a general rule the damages are measured by the value of the property,¹⁹ with interest from the time when it was taken.²⁰

The amount received by an officer on a sale of exempt property on execution is not a proper standard of the value of the property in an action for damages for seizing and selling it, for property does not generally bring its full value at a forced sale.²¹ There can be no recovery for consequences which might have been avoided by plaintiff.²²

If a creditor wrongfully procures the exempt wages of his debtor to be subjected to garnishment and applied in payment of his claim, the measure of damages is the amount of the exempt wages so appropriated, with interest.²³

Where the exempt property is mortgaged, the measure of the amount of damages cannot, it has been held, exceed the value of the property after deducting the amount of the mortgage;²⁴ so, where the property has been sold and the proceeds have been applied to the payment of a mortgage debt, the amount of such payment should go in mitigation of damages.²⁵ According to another view, the amount of the mortgage is not to be taken into consideration, except as against the mortgagee.²⁶

Damages for injury to plaintiff's business through the seizure of exempt property may, when established, be recovered.²⁷ In any case, to authorize the allowance of such damages the loss of business must be shown.²⁸

Mental distress is not an element of actual damage for seizure and sale of property exempt from execution.²⁹

If the property is returned or recovered, and is available for present use, the measure of damages is the value of the use during the time of detention,³⁰ or in lieu thereof any special damage which the debtor may have sustained as the proximate and natural result of the wrong.³¹ If the property is not of value for use, interest on its value should be allowed.³² There should always be an allowance for any deterioration in value by reason of the seizure.³³

Attorney's fees incurred in the successful repossession of the property are not an element of damages in the absence of fraud, willful wrong, oppression, or malice.³⁴ However, attorney's fees have been allowed where a debtor was compelled to obtain legal counsel to enjoin the sale of exempt property.^{34.5}

Exemplary damages may be awarded, where circumstances justify, in an action for the wrongful seizure of, or interference with, exempt property.³⁵ It is not sufficient, however, that the seizure or sale of the property was wrongful, but it must have been wanton and malicious;³⁶ so, an execution plaintiff is not liable for exemplary damages for the seizure and sale of exempt property if he directed it to be made under the honest belief that the property was not exempt, and the evidence rebuts any reasonable inference of an improper motive or oppressive conduct,³⁷ but he is equally liable with the officer if he acts oppressively or maliciously or with knowledge that the property is exempt.³⁸ Exemplary damages, when justified by the circumstances, must not be excessive.³⁹

In an action for a penalty of double or triple damages, as discussed supra § 151, any credit to which defendant is entitled is to be deducted after, not before, the damages are doubled or trebled, in computing the amount of the judgment.⁴⁰ If plaintiff brings his action to recover the penalty provided by statute, he cannot have exemplary damages, but is confined to the penalty.⁴¹

Forfeiture of debt. Under a statute so providing, a creditor who secures the issuance of process to reach more than a certain percentage of the debtor's earnings forfeits the debt.⁴² Such a statute applies only where the creditor intentionally undertakes to subject an undue percentage of the debtor's earnings to the satisfaction of the debt;⁴³ the issuance of process against earnings which the debtor has represented as not exempt does not forfeit the debt.⁴⁴ An affidavit for garnishment is not "process" within the meaning of such statute, and the failure of the affidavit specifically to exempt the stated proportion of the debtor's earnings does not forfeit the debt.⁴⁵

EXONERATE. To exculpate, to relieve.³ In the past tense, to be relieved of as a charge, to be discharged or exempted.⁴

EXONERATION. The removal of a burden, charge, or duty; particularly, the act of relieving a person or estate from a charge or liability by casting the same upon another person or estate;⁵ the state of being disburdened or freed from a charge; something that is supposed to take place after a charge has been made.⁶

Also the right to be reimbursed which a person has who has been compelled to pay what another should be forced to pay in full;⁷ a right which exists between those who are successively liable for the same debt, by which, when a party who is secondarily liable has paid or satisfied the principal's obligation or any part thereof, he is entitled to be reimbursed by the principal debtor, and can bring a bill in equity for that purpose;⁸ and, more specifically, a right to have a particular fund applied to the payment of guaranteed claims.⁹

In Scotch law, a discharge; or the act of being legally disburdened of, or liberated from, the performance of a duty or obligation.¹⁰

As used with reference to a surety's rights and liabilities see Principal and Surety § 303. For some other references to specific uses of the term see 25 C.J. p 169 note 7.

EXONERATIONE SECTÆ. A writ that lay for the crown's ward, to be free from all suit to the county court, hundred court, leet, etc., during wardship.¹¹

EXONERATIONE SECTÆ AD CURIAM BARON. A writ of the same nature as that last above described, issued by the guardian of the crown's ward, and addressed to the sheriffs or stewards of the courts, forbidding them to distrain him, etc., for not doing suit of court, etc.¹²

EXONERETUR. Literally "Let him be relieved or discharged." An entry made on a bailpiece, whereby the surety is relieved or discharged from further obligation, when the condition is fulfilled by the surrender of the principal or otherwise.¹³

EXOPHORIA. A term meaning that the visual lines tend outward.^{13.50}

EXOPHTHALMIC GOITER. A disease characterized by exophthalmia, a protrusion of the eyeball, enlargement of the thyroid gland, and frequent pulse. Also called Graves' or Basedow's disease.¹⁴

EXORBITANT. Deviating from the normal or customary course; going beyond the rule or established limits of right or propriety.¹⁵

EXORDIUM. The beginning or introductory part of a speech.¹⁶

EXOTHERMIC. Noting a chemical compound the formation of which is attended with the development of heat; relating to the external warmth of the body.^{16.50}

EXPEDITION. Primarily, a sending forth or setting forth for the execution of some object of consequence; also progress;⁷² more specifically, an excursion, journey, or voyage made by a company or body of persons for a specific purpose; an important journey or excursion for a specific purpose, as a military or exploring expedition; a journey, march, or voyage, generally of several or many persons, for a definite purpose;⁷³ a march or voyage with martial or hostile intentions.⁷⁴ In this sense it does not mean the body which marches, but rather the march itself;⁷⁵ although the term is sometimes employed to designate the armament itself, as well as the movement of that armament,⁷⁶ and also the body of persons making such an excursion.⁷⁷

It has been said that, while in a wide sense the word may be used to include any journey or voyage, its usually accepted meaning carries a notion of exploratory or warlike enterprise,⁷⁸ that is, of a military exploit or of an exploration into remote regions or over new routes.⁷⁹ It requires more than one person, and hazard or danger is not necessarily involved.^{79.5}

The term has been compared with, and distinguished from, "enterprise" see the C.J.S. definition of that term, "hazardous event,"⁸⁰ "journey" or "trip,"⁸¹ and "operation."⁸²

EXPEDITIOUS. Possessed of, or characterized by, expedition or efficiency and rapidity in action; performed with, or acting with, expedition; hence, quick, or speedy, as an expeditious march or messenger.⁸³

It has been held to be synonymous with "prompt."^{83.5}

EXPEDITIOUSLY. In an expeditious manner, speedily, with celerity or dispatch.⁸⁴

The term has been distinguished from "with reasonable dispatch."⁸⁵

EXPUL. To drive or force out, to eject.⁸⁸ The term may imply force.⁸⁹

As applied to membership in an association, "expel" means to dismiss or exclude,⁹⁰ or to cut off from membership in or the privileges of.^{90.5}

"Expel" has been held to be synonymous with "exile," "oust," and "dispossess."^{90.10}

"Expel" and "resign" have opposite meanings,^{90.15} and it has been held that "expel" and "retire" are not synonymous terms.^{90.20}

EXPEND. The word is derived from the Latin words "ex," meaning out, and "pendere," to weigh, referring to the ancient custom of payment by weight of cereals and other products.⁹¹

It is defined as meaning to weigh out;⁹² to disburse;⁹³ to dispose of;⁹⁴ to pay out, lay out, or to use up;⁹⁵ to consume by use in any way; to spend, to expend time, labor and thought;⁹⁶ and particular uses of the word may carry the implication of receiving something in return.⁹⁷

"Expend" has been held equivalent to, or synonymous with, "consume" see the C.J.S. definition Consume. It has been compared with "spend."⁹⁸ In a particular connection, "expended" has been held equivalent to "incurred."⁹⁹

Phrases employing the word are set out in the subjoined note.¹

EXPENDEDOR. In Spanish law, the secret purveyor of the fruits of a crime, as counterfeit money, stolen goods, etc. He is an aider and abettor of the crime when his possession is the result of a conspiracy formed before its commission; if his first connection arises thereafter he is an accessory.²

EXPENDITORS. Paymasters, those who expend or disburse certain taxes. Formerly the sworn officer who supervised the repairs of the banks of the canals in Romney Marsh.³

EXPENDITURE. In its broader sense the word "expenditure" is any laying out or disbursement of money;^{3.50} and the term is defined as meaning the act of expending; disbursement, expense, money expended, a laying out, as of money, or the spending of money;⁴ also, sometimes, payment;⁵ an outlay of money.^{5.5} The term does, however, often connote the using up or consumption of property.^{5.10} The meaning of the word is particularly governed by its context.⁶

14. Legal and popular senses compared

It is apparent that the popular significance of "expenses" would far transcend the technical legal connotation of the term.

N.Y.—In re Bates' Will, 274 N.Y.S. 93, 96, 152 Misc. 627.

The term is variously defined as the act of expending; disbursement, or expenditure;¹⁵ disbursement of money, or the laying out or expending of money or other resources;¹⁶ outlay of money;^{16.5} expenditure, outlay, or disbursement of money;^{16.10} an actual and honest disbursement;¹⁷ but the term is not limited to expenditure of money, or to pecuniary expense,¹⁸ for it may mean the employment and consumption of time, labor, strength, or thought.¹⁹

The term is further defined as meaning the habit of expending;²⁰ also that which is spent;²¹ that which is expended, laid out, or consumed;^{21.5} charge, as expenses for the journey, or cost;²² money expended or actually paid out;²³ outlay;²⁴ the payment of a price.²⁵ Also burden of expenditure, consumption, or a using-up;²⁶ drain on resources; detriment, or loss, as at the expense of health or time.²⁷

It has been said that the expenditure necessary to maintain property and protect it from attack or loss is expense,^{27.5} and it further has been said that the word "expense," as used in a legal sense, is the expense of the suit; the costs which are generally allowed to the successful party; all the expenses which the property owner is put to by the litigation.^{27.10}

In particular connections, the term may be interchangeable or synonymous with "costs,"²⁸ and "disbursement," see the C.J.S. definition Disbursement.

"Expenses" . . . is a word frequently used in the Scotch Courts where the English Courts would use the word "costs."

Can.—Regina v. Vantassel, 5 Can.Cr. Cas. 128, 132.

It has been compared with, or distinguished from, "costs" see Costs § 1 note 27, "debts" see the C.J.S. definition Debts, "fees,"²⁹ "liability,"³⁰ and "value."³¹

It has been contrasted with "investment."^{31.5}

Expenses are treated in various connections throughout this work, and particularly in connection with the levy and collection of taxes, and for specific references in these connections see the indexes to the titles Internal Revenue and Taxation.

Extraordinary expense. The term, applied to government expenses, has been defined as such as must be incurred by the state for the promotion of the general welfare, compelled by some unforeseen condition which is not regularly provided for by law, such as flood, famine, fire, earthquake, pestilence, war, or any other condition that will compel the state to put forward its highest endeavors to protect the people, their property, liberty, or lives.³² Under particular circumstances, such expenses may be "necessary expenses."³³

The term has been contrasted with "current and legislative expenses,"³⁴ "ordinary expenses,"³⁵ and "ordinary current expenses."³⁶

Necessary expense. An expense necessarily incurred in discharging a duty imposed by law;³⁷ an expense required to effect a particular purpose.³⁸ In the subjoined note some examples are given of various items which, under particular circumstances, have been held to be, or not to be, "necessary expenses."³⁹ The phrase is sometimes used with other

Test of a necessary expense

"The decisions . . . make the test of a 'necessary expense' the purpose for which the expense is to be incurred. If the purpose is the maintenance of the public peace or the administration of justice, if it partakes of a governmental nature or purports to be an exercise . . . of a portion of the state's delegated sovereignty, if, in brief, it involves a necessary governmental expense—in these cases the expense required to effect the purpose is necessary." EXPILACIÓN. In Spanish law, the misappropriation or malicious concealment of an unaccepted share in an inheritance.⁷³

EXPILARE, EXPILATIO, and EXPILATOR. See the C.J.S. definition Ex.

EXPIRATION. A particular word, peculiarly appropriated to effluxion of time,⁷⁴ and defined as meaning a coming to a close;⁷⁵ cessation or end.⁷⁶

The term has been compared with, or distinguished from, "termination."⁷⁷

For references to some specific uses of the term see 25 C.J. p 177 note 13.

Phrases employing the word are set out in the subjoined note.⁷⁸

EXPIRE. Primarily, to emit the last breath; to perish, hence to cease, to come to an end, to conclude, to terminate;⁷⁹ to cease to exist.⁸⁰

The term has been held equivalent to "elapse" and "intervene,"⁸¹ and has been distinguished from "terminate."^{81.5}

Expired. Ended by lapse of time or by limitation.⁸²

The term has been distinguished from "canceled," see the C.J.S. definition of that word, and it has also been distinguished from "terminated."^{82.5}

EXPIRY OF THE LEGAL. In Scotch law and practice, expiration of the period within which an adjudication may be redeemed by paying the debt in the decree of adjudication.⁸³

EXPLAIN. A word of indefinite meaning, signifying to make plain, manifest, or intelligible; to clear of obscurity; to expound; to illustrate by discourse or by notes.^{83.50}

EXPLANATION. When used in connection with charges against a person in office, it may consist either in excusing any delinquency or apparent neglect or incapacity, that is, explaining the favorable appearances, or disapproving the charges.⁸⁴

In particular connections the term has been held synonymous with "description" see the C.J.S. definition of that term; and has been distinguished from "complaint"⁸⁵ and from "hearing."⁸⁶

Tex.—Corpus Juris Secundum cited in Millers Mutual Fire Insurance Co. of Tex. v. Schwartz, Civ.App., 312 S.W.2d 313, 314—Corpus Juris Secundum quoted in Crombie & Co.

Its general characteristics may be described, but the exact facts which constitute what we call by that name are not susceptible of such statement as will always distinguish the occurrences.² It may, and often does, vary in degree of intensity and in the vehemence of the report, and it is not always due to the presence of fire; indeed, it may result from decomposition or chemical action,³ and an explosion may be caused by an instantaneous build-up of pressure caused by a sudden stoppage of the flow of water,^{3,5} and it may occur by reason of the creation, expansion, and resulting pressure of steam as well as by ignition or combustion.^{3,10}

It must be conceded, however, that every combustion of an explosive substance whereby other property is ignited and consumed would not be an "explosion" within the ordinary meaning of the term, and the rapidity of the combustion, the violence of the expansion, and the vehemence of the report vary in intensity as often as the occurrences multiply; hence an explosion is an idea of degrees, and the true meaning of the word in each particular case must be settled, not by any fixed standard or accurate measurement, but by the common experience and notions of men in matters of that sort.⁴ It has been said that the term is to be construed in its popular sense, and as understood by ordinary men, and not by scientific men.⁵

The word "explosion" is defined in a general way as meaning a sudden and rapid combustion, causing violent expansion of the air, and accompanied by a report;⁶ a rapid, sudden, and violent expansion of air, or a release or relinquishment of energy causing a rupture and accompanied by a loud noise.^{6,5}

- Combustion not only cause
- An explosion may be caused by combustion, and frequently is, but combustion is not necessarily the only cause of such an occurrence; there need not be a fire or combustion before it may be said that an explosion has occurred, since an explosion may take place by reason of the creation and transmission of pressure (as of air, gas, or liquid), as well as by ignition or combustion.

although it is not necessary that the noise be extremely loud;^{6,10} a violent bursting or expansion, with great noise, following the sudden production of great pressure or a sudden release of pressure;^{6,15} the noise made by such bursting.^{6,20}

In a broad sense, apart from combustion, the term has been defined as meaning the act of exploding, bursting with a loud noise, or detonation; a shattering by a sudden and immense pressure, in distinction from rupture; a sudden bursting or breaking up or in pieces, from an internal or other force;⁷ a blowing up or tearing apart;⁸ a sudden and violent expansion of the parts of a body, by its component parts acquiring a great increase of bulk;⁹ a sudden expansion of a liquid substance, with the result that the gas generated by the expansion escapes with violence, usually causing a loud noise;¹⁰ the result due to the conversion of a solid or liquid into a gas, or the expansion of a gas, which is accompanied by a loud report and the shattering of the material about it.¹¹

Used in the narrower sense as referring to explosion by combustion, it has been said that when produced by ignition, according to common understanding, it may be accurately enough described for practical purposes as a sudden and rapid combustion causing a violent expansion of the air and producing a report more or less loud according to the resistance offered;¹² a sudden inflaming with force

§ 1. Definition

An "explosive" is a substance or combination of substances which upon rapid decomposition or combustion causes an explosion, that is, a violent bursting or expansion with noise.

An "explosive" may be defined as any substance by whose decomposition or combustion gas is generated with such rapidity that it can be used for blasting or in firearms,¹ or as a substance or as the combination of substances which upon rapid decomposition or combustion causes an explosion, that is, a violent bursting or expansion with noise.^{1,5} However, not every substance which may cause an explosion may be termed an explosive, as, for example, steam which causes a boiler to burst or explode.^{1,10}

The word is also used as a general term indicating a substance which, by a certain treatment, explodes, that is, decomposes or changes in a violent manner so as to generate force.² In this sense explosives may be divided into two classes, "propellants" and "detonators."³ Before the invention of gunpowder or blasting powder, the term "Greek fire" was applied to explosives.⁴

"Dynamite" is an explosive made by combining nitroglycerin, which is its active explosive element, with an absorbent solid material,⁵ or a mixture of nitroglycerin with some solid and inert absorbent substance, containing no other explosive ingredient.⁶

Gun cotton is a general name for the nitrates of cellulose either wet or dry.^{6,5} Gun cotton, also known as pyrocellulose,^{6,10} or nitrocellulose,^{6,15} is an explosive obtained by immersing vegetable fibre in nitric and sulphuric acids, and subsequent drying,^{6,20} or by digesting clean cotton in a mixture of nitric and sulphuric acid.^{6,25}

"Pitch" is a carbonaceous substance more than ninety-nine per cent combustible and more than fifty per cent volatile,⁷ and "pitch dust" is merely pitch in a fine state of subdivision.⁸

general purpose, which is the protection of the health, safety, and general welfare of the public.^{10.5} The legislature may require an application for a permit to use an explosive in blasting.¹¹ The legislature has power to enact laws that will protect the people from the dangers of gasoline by prescribing rules and regulations for its distribution,¹² and owners of gasoline have no inherent or natural right to sell or dispose of it like other property and thereby be immune from regulation.¹³

Subject to the usual rules as to the delegation of authority to an administrative officer, the legislature may authorize a state officer to issue reasonable rules and regulations for the keeping and transporting of explosives.^{13.5}

b. Regulation by Municipal Corporation

A municipality may regulate the keeping, using, and selling of explosives within its corporate limits.

ing, using, and selling of explosives within its corporate limits¹⁴ under its general powers as to public safety, welfare, health, etc.,¹⁵ or under an express or implied grant of power for the purpose.¹⁶

The legislature may vest municipalities with the power to protect themselves against the hazards of fire and explosion arising from the storage of all combustible or explosive materials;^{16.5} but, where the delegated power is resumed by the state through legislative action, a municipal corporation cannot by its own action reacquire such power and pass valid regulatory ordinances.^{16.10} Moreover, where the state has preëempted the regulation of a particular industry, operation, or occupation, a local municipality may not impose the same or similar regulations.^{16.15}

When acting within its powers, a municipal corporation may provide for the examination and inspection of explosives,¹⁷ or of places,¹⁸ instrumen-

It may prescribe the maximum quantity of gunpowder, dynamite, nitroglycerin, grain, hay, excelsior, gasoline, or other combustible or inflammable material which may be stored in one place or kept in one house within the municipal boundaries²¹ or transported along the streets in one vehicle.²² It may require that the tanks for storage of kerosene and gasoline therefor shall be placed underground.²³

A municipal corporation cannot absolutely prohibit the use of gasoline, naphtha, etc.,²⁴ but as to some explosives it may have the absolute power to prohibit their storage and transportation within the municipal limits.²⁵ The drilling of oil wells within the municipal boundaries, if it endangers the lives and property of the inhabitants, may be prohibited,²⁶ and it is within the police power of a municipality, when it is deemed necessary for public safety, to prohibit the blasting of rocks with gunpowder within the city limits without the written consent of the board of aldermen.²⁷

Fireworks. The regulation of the use and sale of fireworks in a city,²⁸ including the prohibition of the explosion of fire crackers without the written consent of a designated official or board,²⁹ is a legitimate exercise of the police power. In the exercise of their police powers, municipalities may also prohibit the sale of fireworks;^{29.5} but where the statute grants only the power to regulate the storage of fireworks, a municipal corporation cannot prohibit the possession, sale, or control of fireworks.^{29.10}

§ 3. Statutory and Municipal Regulation

Reasonable statutory and municipal regulations, including a statute creating a presumption of guilt from possession of high explosives by persons not regularly engaged in the manufacture or legitimate use thereof, may be sustained and will be construed under general rules.

The purpose of a statute relating to storage, transportation, and use of explosives is to minimize danger to persons and property from improper storage of explosives,³⁰ and to protect life and property.³¹ A statute contemplating the importation of explosives into the state is not intended to prohibit the transportation and possession necessary thereto, where its avowed purpose is to regulate the use and sale of explosives in the interest of safety.^{31.5} A statute declaring that a person not regularly engaged in the manufacture, sale, transportation, or legitimate use of high explosives who is discovered in possession thereof shall be presumed guilty of reckless and malicious possession is not unconstitutional.³²

Municipal regulations of the keeping, using, and selling of explosives must be reasonable,³³ and not

Ordinances held void

(1) Ordinance held void for lack of sufficient rules and specifications. Iowa.—Edwards & Browne Coal Co. v. Sioux City, 240 N.W. 711, 213 Iowa 1027.

(2) Where the township supervisors adopted a resolution limiting the size of tanks for the storage of crude oil and its volatile products to seventy-five thousand gallons, there being no relation between the size of storage tanks and the danger involved, the court, noting that the resolution simply limited the size of tanks but not the quantity of inflammables to be stored in one location, held the resolution void and of no effect.

If the ordinance bears a reasonable relation to public safety, the court is not concerned with any other motives which may have helped to promote its adoption.^{38.10} The fact that the necessarily general form of an ordinance prohibiting the storing

Who may apply

"Applicant" for license to erect tanks for petroleum products need not be owner of land whereon tanks were to be erected.

Mass.—Morrison v. Selectmen of Town of Weymouth, 181 N.E. 786, 279 Mass. 486.

Notice of hearing

(1) Abutting owner filing protest at town selectmen's hearing to granting oil company license to erect storage tanks could not thereafter object to want of notice of hearing, in the absence of such objection at hearing, nor could he object that commonwealth did not have notice of proceedings. Further, the voluntary appearance of party entitled to notice dispenses with necessity of formal notice.

Mass.—Morrison v. Selectmen of Town of Weymouth, supra.

(2) License for keeping, storage, and sale of petroleum products in city was valid as against contention that insufficient notice was given, where, although there was no sufficient notice by publication before date first set for hearing, there was such notice before actual hearing; notice being given by clerk of board of street commissioners.

Mass.—White Fuel Co. v. Board of Street Com'rs of City of Boston, 194 N.E. 130, 289 Mass. 337.

Omission of condition

Selectmen's omission from license granted oil company to erect petroleum storage tanks of condition upon which license was granted did not invalidate license nor condition.

Extension or renewal

(1) The official or board clothed with the authority to issue or grant the permit for the keeping of explosives may insist on new requirements not inconsistent with the terms of the ordinance, as a prerequisite to the renewal of the permit, when riper experience and added knowledge suggest newer safeguards for the protection of the public.

N.Y.—People v. Walsh, 196 N.Y.S. 536, 119 Misc. 510.

(2) Under statute providing that structure "once used" under license for storing petroleum products may be continued in such use from year to year if occupant, while such use continues, annually files, on or before April 30, certificate reciting such use, licensee intending to apply license to structure not yet erected takes risk of being unable to use structure for purposes of license before next succeeding April 30, and, in such case, of being unable to renew license as of that date. Certificate of use and occupancy of structure under license for storage cannot extend rights granted by license beyond April 30 next following issue of license as to any structure not built by that time, although license may be granted to apply to structures not yet erected. License does not entitle licensee to use or erect any structure not in existence on April 30 following grant of license, although construction work was delayed by appeals to state fire marshal, by litigation arising out of attempted revocation of license, and by risk created by uncertainty as to permanency of license. Time for per-discretion whether to issue or withhold a permit,^{43.15} and, as long as it does not act arbitrarily, the court will not interfere with the exercise of its discretion;^{43.20} but the grant or refusal of such permits cannot be left to arbitrary discretion.⁴⁴ forming acts necessary to entitle licensee to extension of license for storage of petroleum products is not extended by appeal to state fire marshal, since license is in existence pending appeal.

Mass.—City of Boston v. White Fuel Corporation, 1 N.E.2d 186, 294 Mass. 258.

Restoration

Where a building resting on piles, and used for storing petroleum, the cost of which building was three thousand dollars, burned down, and the value of the remaining material for use in a new building was one thousand four hundred fifty dollars, the owners were entitled to restore it without obtaining a license, under statute providing that no "building" for the storage of petroleum shall be "erected" without license.

Mass.—City of Somerville v. Walker, 47 N.E. 127, 168 Mass. 388.

Permit held not required

(1) An ordinance controlling the storing of oil and gasoline did not require the taking out of permit to store gasoline when done in the manner prescribed.

Neb.—Brown v. Easterday, 194 N.W. 798, 110 Neb. 729.

(2) Ordinances requiring permit to manufacture, store, or keep for sale paints, varnishes, or lacquers in quantities greater than twenty gallons, and providing that no permit shall issue for manufacture or mixing of paints in tenement houses, dwellings, hotels, workshops, or factories, do not prohibit ordinary painter from mixing paints while working in tenement house or hotel, but seek occupants' safety by preventing storing of more than twenty gallons of paint without a permit and mixing paint in connection therewith.

Power of town board

When town exercises statutory power to enact precise and detailed ordinance regulating use, sale, storage and transportation of explosives and inflammables, no further power is left in town board except that which it reserves to itself to administer ordinance.

N.Y.—Larkin Co. v. Schwab, 151 N.E. 637, 242 N.Y. 330.

Danger to traffic

(1) Council could consider whether consent for storage of gasoline would interfere with or be dangerous to traffic.

N.Y.—Larkin Co. v. Schwab, supra.

(2) In ordinance authorizing township committee to grant or refuse permit for storage and sale of gasoline and other inflammables, as committee shall deem proper for protection of life and property from fire, explosions and other dangers, the phrase "other dangers" does not permit committee to refuse permit on theory that gasoline station will increase traffic hazards and thereby endanger life and property.

Appeals

(1) Where property of petitioner located in industrial district of village was bounded by a private right of way, railroad tracks, a deep water channel, and industrial property, and it did not appear that village ordinances prohibited storage of petroleum products, village board of zoning appeals was authorized to entertain appeal from building committee denying petitioner's application for permit to erect petroleum storage tanks and to grant variation of regulation in zoning ordinance prohibiting erection of buildings for storage of petroleum.

N.Y.—Beckmann v. Talbot, 15 N.E.2d 556, 278 N.Y. 146, reargument denied 16 N.E.2d 849, 278 N.Y. 700.

(2) Nonresidents of a village could not maintain a proceeding in the nature of certiorari to review a determination of the board of trustees of the village permitting installation and erection of oil storage tanks on property adjacent to that of petitioners but within the village.

N.Y.—Browning v. Bryant, 34 N.Y.S. 2d 280, 178 Misc. 576, affirmed 34 N.Y.S.2d 729, 264 App.Div. 777.

(3) Statutory right of appeal to fire marshal after granting of license is for sole purpose of having marshal pass on question whether exercise of license would constitute fire or explosion hazard, which depends on circumstances of each case, particularly where inquiry concerns structures not erected, final responsibility of deciding in particular case whether exercise of license issued under statute would result in fire hazard being placed on fire marshal.

Mass.—Leach v. State Fire Marshal, 179 N.E. 616, 278 Mass. 159.

(4) Property of landowner need not abut that to which license for storage of petroleum products applies in order that owner be a "person aggrieved" within statute permitting appeal to the fire marshal.

Mass.—N. V. Handel Industrie Transport Maatschappij v. State Fire Marshal, 26 N.E.2d 304, 305 Mass. 482—Standard Oil Co. of New York v. Commissioner of Public Safety, 174 N.E. 213, 274 Mass. 155.

(5) But a nearby resident who does not own the property upon which he lives is not an aggrieved person within the meaning of the statute.

Mass.—N. V. Handel Industrie Transport Maatschappij v. State Fire Marshal, supra—Barnard v. Metropolitan Ice Co., 180 N.E. 308, 278 Mass. 441.

(6) Evidence as to action of fire marshal's predecessor in office concerning licenses previously granted was immaterial as to whether exercise of licenses would constitute fire or explosion hazard.

Mass.—Leach v. State Fire Marshal, supra.

(7) That persons other than licensees expected to operate under licenses was no reason why fire marshal should not proceed with hearing to determine fire or explosion hazard.

Mass.—Leach v. State Fire Marshal, supra.

(8) Fire marshal's return was conclusive against licensee as to the

Such a license or permit is a personal privilege which does not attach and run with the land until the privilege conferred has been exercised,⁴⁵ although as soon as the rights conferred by it are exercised it becomes a grant which attaches and thereafter runs with the land.⁴⁶ It is not a contract, but is the means adopted to supervise and control a certain use of private property which, unless regulated, might result in a serious fire hazard threatening the safety of the community.⁴⁷

Subject to rules covering the revocation of permits generally, which rules are treated in Municipal Corporations § 173, a permit for the storage of explosives may subsequently be revoked,⁴⁸ but the exercise of the power to revoke is dependent on the existence of legal cause, and arbitrary action by the licensing authorities is not justified.⁴⁹

Acceptance of the license imposes on the holder the duty to comply with the requirements of the statute⁵⁰ or the conditions of the license,⁵¹ and failure to do so is sufficient cause for revoking the license.⁵² The power to revoke being measured by statute, compliance with the statute is essential to the validity of revocation,⁵³ and the function of the licensing board in revoking a license is of a quasi judicial character.⁵⁴ ground upon which marshal entertained jurisdiction.

(9) Fire marshal's failure to refer in terms to explosion hazard in decision may be interpreted to mean that if restrictions mentioned are observed neither fire nor explosion hazard would result from exercise of licenses.

Mass.—Leach v. State Fire Marshal, supra.

(10) Fire marshal should so perform duties as to hamper conduct of a legitimate business licensed by proper authority as little as possible, consistent with elimination of fire or explosion hazard. In practical administration of office, he may state in advance conditions under which license might be exercised so as to be free from fire hazard, and in submitting schedule of restrictions for exercise of license so as not to create fire hazard, he did not invade province of department authorized to make rules and regulations for storage and sale of petroleum products. Whether conditions imposed may be specifically enforced is immaterial in view of marshal's undoubted power to revoke licenses if fire or explosion hazard exists.

Mass.—Leach v. State Fire Marshal, supra.

(11) A finding by the fire marshal that a fire or explosion hazard would result from the exercise of the license, and notice thereof to the local licensing authority amounts to a revocation of the license.

53. Notice

Requirement that local licensing authority give licensee notice of grounds on which it intends to revoke license to store and sell petroleum products is not a matter of procedure alone, but is one of substantive right, and, although the notice need not be drafted with the certainty of a criminal pleading, due regard must be had to the nature of the proceeding and the character of the rights that may be affected. The grounds on which the licensing authority proposes to revoke the license should be stated with reasonable particularity so that the notice fairly apprises licensee of charge which he must be prepared to meet. The notice is not invalidated by mere defect in matter of form if enough remains for licensee reasonably to understand the substance and nature of ground which he is called on to answer, but the notice must, in conjunction with the hearing, be sufficient to accomplish substantial justice in accordance with general aim of similar statutory proceedings. Breach of conditions of license within notice would be construed to mean existing violations of the terms of the license and to refer to some conduct of licensee inconsistent with provisions of the license but would not be construed to relate to conduct of licensee as an applicant or to his action antecedent to issuance of the license.

§ 4. Civil Liability for Injuries

- a. In general
- b. Effect of violation of statutory or municipal regulation generally

a. In General

A liability in tort for injuries resulting from explosives must be based on nuisance or negligence, and the proximate cause of the injury must have been defendant's wrongful act, the degree of care required being commensurate with the apparent danger.

A liability in tort for injuries arising from explosives must be based on either the theory of a nuisance or of the existence of negligence,⁵⁵ and, as shown infra § 11, the imputation of negligence will not always arise from the fact of an explosion.

In accordance with the general rules governing torts, the proximate cause of the injury and of the damage must have been defendant's wrongful act.⁵⁶ Where, in the sequence of events between the original default and the final result, an entirely independent unforeseen cause intervenes sufficient to stand as the cause of the mischief, the second cause is ordinarily regarded as the proximate cause.^{56.5} The degree of care required as to explosives, as in the case of other dangerous agencies, must be commensurate with the apparent danger,⁵⁷ particularly to children and those of immature judgment;^{57.5} in order to prove negligence in the case of an explosive, it is ordinarily necessary to show a standard of safety and a departure therefrom.^{57.10}

One delivering an article which he knows, or ought to know, to be peculiarly dangerous must give notice of its character, or bear the natural consequences of his failure to do so;⁵⁸ and in other cir-

So a garage owner, permitting such truckload to be brought into garage, without knowing its dangerous condition, and permitting it to remain, and allowing his tools and light to be used in repairing truck without compensation to owner, was not precluded from recovering for damages sustained when garage was set on fire because of negligence of operator of truck.

b. Effect of Violation of Statutory or Municipal Regulation Generally

The violation of statutes or ordinances regulating the manufacture, storage, or disposition of explosives may be held to constitute negligence per se.

As in other cases of a violation of statutes, or ordinances imposed under the police power of the state, see Negligence § 19, the violation of statutes and ordinances regulating the manufacture, storage, or disposition of explosives is by some authorities held to constitute negligence per se.⁶⁰ However, in order to warrant a recovery, it must be shown that there was a causal connection between the violation of the provisions and the injuries complained of.⁶¹

Where the duty imposed by the statute is manifestly intended for the protection and benefit of individuals, the common law, when an individual is injured by a breach of such duty, will supply a remedy if the statute gives none,⁶² but the individual must have been placed in a position which gave him particular occasion to insist on the duty imposed by the statute.⁶³ Where the statute does not provide therefor, a civil action will not lie directly in consequence of a violation without specific allegations sufficient to support an action at law as for negligence or willful tort.⁶⁴

§ 5. — Manufacture, Storage, or Keeping

a. Manufacture

b. Storage or keeping

a. Manufacture

The manufacturer of an explosive is liable to anyone injured by an explosion thereof if the manufacture was under circumstances creating a public nuisance or if the manufacturer was negligent.

As shown in Negligence § 100, a manufacturer or seller of an article which is inherently and imminently dangerous to human life or health is liable to any person who, without fault on his part, sustains an injury which is the natural and proximate result of negligence in the manufacture or sale of the article. Explosives are generally recognized as being inherently and imminently dangerous within the meaning of the rule.⁶⁵ The manufacture of an explosive under such circumstances or in such places as to constitute a public nuisance will authorize a recovery by anyone injured by an explosion of such explosive without proof of negligence on the part of the manufacturer,⁶⁶ but in the absence of the creation of such a nuisance, negligence on the part of the manufacturer must be shown in order to warrant a recovery.⁶⁷ So, a company mining coal for its own use and not engaged generally in the sale of coal to the public or to retailers for distribution to the public, the transaction in question being an isolated one, is not liable for an injury to another from an explosive concealed, without its knowledge, in a lump of coal.⁶⁸

It is the duty of a manufacturer of high explosives to exercise proper care commensurate with the dangerous character of the business,⁶⁹ to protect from injury those who consume or have occa-

(2) A manufacturer of a very dangerous substance, such as dynamite, is held to a high degree of care in guarding against injury to those to whom the substance is supplied.

U.S.—Hopkins v. E. I. Du Pont De Nemours & Co., C.A.Pa., 212 F.2d 623.

Warning of danger

(1) Duty of manufacturer of shells of great force, for use in testing of guns, to use due care to see that shells come to rest in position of apparent safety extended only to persons whom normal prudent man might reasonably have anticipated would be exposed to danger. So, where such shells were manufactured for use by arms manufacturers, notices printed on container and shells that they were "Proof Loads" and of "7.5 Tons Pressure" was held sufficient notice to arms manufacturers and dealers in shells for arms manufacturers of dangerous character of the shells, and manufacturer was not liable to hunter, to whom a friend had given an unopened box of the shells, sustaining injury when one of the shells exploded his gun barrel. N.Y.—Harper v. Remington Arms Co., 280 N.Y.S. 862, 156 Misc. 53, affirmed 290 N.Y.S. 130, 248 App. Div. 713.

(2) Where waterproofing compound purchased for use as a primer coat on circular water tanks was inherently dangerous in that it was a highly volatile substance, seller who was also manufacturer thereof had duty of giving adequate warning with respect to its use in the tanks. U.S.—Standard Oil Co. v. Lyons, C.C. A.Iowa, 130 F.2d 965.

(3) Where blasting foreman had knowledge of danger of premature explosion of dynamite placed in newly drilled hole before allowing heat caused by drilling to escape, manufacturer of dynamite was not negligent in failing to warn of such danger.

One who stores explosives under circumstances rendering him guilty of maintaining a nuisance is liable, irrespective of negligence, for damages resulting from an explosion thereof; but generally where the storing is not a nuisance or in violation of law, liability does not arise in the absence of negligence.

One who stores and keeps gunpowder, dynamite, or other explosives on his premises, under circumstances rendering him guilty of maintaining a nuisance in so doing, is liable for all damages resulting from an explosion of such explosives whether he is chargeable with negligence or not.⁷³ He is bound to take every possible precaution to pre-

Attractive nuisance

Tenn.—Nashville Ry. & Light Co. v. Williams, 11 Tenn.App. 1.

Builder of storage facilities held not liable

Contractors who supplied the material and built tank for storage of liquefied gas could not be held liable for death caused by explosion on theory of nuisance or ultra-hazardous activity, because gas liquefaction

vent injury, the only exceptions being a possible explosion precipitated by an unanticipated natural force and the wrongful acts of persons over whom he has no control and which reasonably could not be anticipated.⁷⁴ Although the immediate cause of the explosion of a powder magazine or storehouse is lightning, this constitutes no defense as an intervening cause, since the occurrence and effect of lightning can reasonably be anticipated.⁷⁵ However, the wrong charged must be the proximate cause of the injury.⁷⁶ Liability is not limited to the premises adjacent to those on which the explosive is stored.⁷⁷

Where, however, the storing of explosives is not a nuisance or in violation of the law, it is generally held that liability does not arise for injuries occasioned by an explosion in the absence of negligence on the part of defendant,⁷⁸ although there is authority to the effect that one storing high explosives such as dynamite in such a locality, or under such circumstances as to cause likelihood of risk to others, stores at his peril, and is an insurer absolutely liable if damage results to third persons either from the direct impact of objects such as rocks thrown out by the explosion or from concussion, such liability existing even though the storer was not negligent or the storage was not illegal.⁷⁹ Those who handle carbide should anticipate that when exposed to the elements it will generate gas, and cannot escape liability to others to whom they owe a duty on the ground that they did not have an opportunity after such exposure to ascertain whether or not gas was being generated.⁸⁰

Notwithstanding the nuisance is legalized, as where it is created in doing work pursuant to legislative authority, liability may exist toward a private individual damaged thereby.⁸¹ A mere permissive statute will not authorize the storage of explosives in such a manner as to constitute a nuisance.⁸²

(2) Violation of Statute or Ordinance

The violation of a statute or ordinance regulating the storage of dangerous explosives constitutes negligence per se, and, apart from negligence, one who keeps explosives in violation of a statute or ordinance is liable for damages proximately caused by an explosion thereof.

The violation of a statute or ordinance regulating the storage of dangerous explosives, designed for the safety of life, limb, and property, constitutes negligence per se, or as a matter of law.⁸³ Apart from the question of negligence, one who keeps explosives in violation of a statute or ordinance is, according to the weight of authority, liable for damages proximately caused by an explosion thereof;⁸⁴ but in order for such liability to exist there must be a causal connection between violation of and storage enterprise was not under their control, although they supervised first filling of tank and were called on from time to time for advice and service.

the statute and the injury.⁸⁵ The failure of a person storing explosives to secure a permit therefor cannot be considered as contributing to the injury of a boy in an explosion where the storer was not within the class of persons required by the statute to secure a permit.⁸⁶

A license or permit will not protect one from a violation of a positive prohibition of a statute or an ordinance⁸⁷ or excuse the leaving of a requisite duty unperformed.⁸⁸ A regulation prohibiting the storage of explosives beyond a certain amount has been held to be violated, even though the storage was only temporary or in due course of transportation,⁸⁹ and although no damage resulted therefrom.⁹⁰ An ordinance making it unlawful to have or keep explosives except in licensed magazines applies only to explosives to be taken out and used elsewhere, and not to explosives left temporarily along the line of work for immediate use.⁹¹ A brick structure entirely open on one side cannot be a vault or safe, within the meaning of an ordinance regulating the storage of dangerous explosives.⁹²

Only members of a class to be benefited can invoke a civil remedy by reason of a penal statute regulating the storage of explosives.⁹³

(3) Negligence

- (a) In general
- (b) Degree of care required
- (c) Proximate cause

(a) In General

Irrespective of whether such conduct would constitute a nuisance, one who negligently handles or stores explosives on his premises or elsewhere is liable for resulting injuries.

One who negligently handles or stores explosives on his premises⁹⁴ or elsewhere⁹⁵ is liable for injuries resulting to others by reason of such negligence, and this without regard to the question whether the storing or handling without negligence under the circumstances would constitute a nuisance.⁹⁶

Coöperation of third person

If an oil company violated an ordinance concerning the obtaining of approval of city board concerning the construction of buildings and structures for the storing of gasoline, and there was an explosion, resulting in damage to third person, the oil company was liable, although another's act coöperated in producing the damage.

Violation of exposure of poison statute

A violation of the statute providing that whoever shall, except in a safe place on his own premises, lay out strychnine or other poison is guilty of a misdemeanor did not render one who laid out poison contrary to statute negligent per se, so as to render him liable to one who was injured and burned by an explosion of the poison when she attempted to light gas burner. In order to recover for such injuries, it was not enough for plaintiff to show that defendant neglected a duty imposed by the statute, but she was required to go further and show that injuries were caused by exposure to hazard from which it was the purpose of the statute to protect her.

gine, which was located at the plant and, at suggestion of manager, ignited match which caused explosion and resulted in injury to plaintiff, plaintiff was an "invitee" of town even though he voluntarily entered the premises only for purpose of seeking employment.

pecially where children are involved;² and the fact that defendant might have intended to return shortly to the scene of the explosion did not justify his leaving the explosives unguarded during the interval, however short.³

The rule requiring one who has the control of dangerous explosives or permits them to be upon his premises to exercise a degree of care in guarding them against injury to others, commensurate with the danger to be apprehended, applies, however, only where the person whom it is sought to hold responsible for resulting injuries is chargeable with notice of the existence and presence of the explosives.⁴ Moreover, the rule is inapplicable to trespassers except as to infants of tender years,⁵ although it has been said that one storing explosives owes to a trespasser a duty of higher degree than merely not willfully to harm him,⁶ and plaintiff's age, without regard to other facts which may be shown in evidence, has been held to be immaterial.^{6.5}

Effect of compliance with statutes or ordinances.
One complying with a municipal ordinance prescribing regulations for the storing of explosives is not relieved from liability for failure to comply with the obligation arising under the general rules of law to use such care in the maintenance and management of one's property as will be ordinarily used by a reasonably prudent man similarly placed.⁷

In order to establish liability, the negligence alleged in keeping or storing an explosive must be the proximate cause of the injury;⁸ but, since disastrous results from negligence in the care of high explosives may reasonably be anticipated, courts will not look too narrowly for independent causes intervening between the injury and the original negligence in keeping,⁹ and will hold an owner liable for

Held not independent intervening proximate cause

(1) Where a fire at a gasoline filling station was caused by a static spark due to defendant's negligence in failing to provide a safety chain or device, it was no defense that the local fire department, responding to an alarm, directed a stream of water on the flowing gasoline which spread over the ground, such act of the fire department not being an independent intervening proximate cause of the injury to plaintiffs' goods stored in a nearby building.

(2) A junk yard maintained with scrap iron, automobile parts, airplane parts, anti-aircraft shells, and other kinds of shells stacked on yard in heart of city and extending along side and over into public street was attractive to children, and proprietor could have reasonably anticipated that thirteen-and-one-half-year-old boy, injured in explosion of anti-aircraft shell carried from yard by boy, would be attracted to yard.

Material question

In determining whether twelve-year-old boy, who was injured when he and his companion removed powder from paper tubes found in city's park after fireworks display and placed it in brass tube and then ignited it, could recover from city, material question was whether city could have reasonably anticipated that tubes left apparently abandoned at place where children were accustomed to playing would be appropriated by the children and used for very purpose for which such powder was intended.

(3) Recovery of damages from junk yard operator for injuries to boy by explosion of anti-aircraft shell picked up by him on street adjacent to junk yard, was not barred on ground that he was a trespasser or guilty of willful wrong in remov-

nuisance doctrine is not applicable where the child knows that he is doing wrong when he takes explosives while trespassing.^{16.5}

The children of a tenant, rightfully upon the leased premises or a way of necessity thereto, are not trespassers, and a landlord leaving attractive explosives exposed and accessible to them is liable for any resulting injury,¹⁷ but he is not liable where he leaves the explosives in a comparatively inaccessible place, such as the loft of a tool house used by his tenant, outside of the tenant's inclosure,¹⁸ nor is defendant liable where he had no knowledge of the presence of the explosives.¹⁹

The extent of care to be taken is affected by the child's knowledge and understanding of the dangers.²⁰ Liability cannot be avoided by the fact that warning has been given to young children.²¹

Proximate cause. Notwithstanding the person injured is a child, to impose liability defendant's act or omission must have been the proximate cause of the injury.²² Thus, there can be no liability where there has been a break in the causal chain between the negligence and the injury,^{22.5} as by an intervening cause,^{22.10} unless such break was itself ing shell from where he found it to his home, as he was entitled to assume that shell was thrown onto street and abandoned by operator. Miss.—Shemper v. Cleveland, 54 So. 2d 215, 212 Miss. 113.

Rule held inapplicable

Rule that property owner is liable to trespasser only for willfully or wantonly injuring him or proximately causing him to be injured was inapplicable in action for injuries to boy by explosion of shell picked up by him on street adjacent to defendant's junk yard, since he was not on defendant's premises as trespasser or otherwise.

In action under the attractive nuisance doctrine, court properly charged that "proximate cause" means that cause which in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new or independent cause, produces injury, and without which injury would not have occurred, and for which it ought to have been foreseen or reasonably anticipated by person in exercise of ordinary care that injuries complained of, or some similar injury, would result naturally and probably in light of attending circumstances.

Tex.—Atex Const. Co. v. Farrow, Civ. App., 71 S.W.2d 323, error refused.

Concurring cause

(1) Where ten year old boy sustained injuries caused by burning naphtha or other substance procured from container which laundry company maintained on its premises in a location accessible to children, company could not rely on another boy's action in throwing some of the same substance on fire which was communicated to ten year old boy's clothing as a new, independent, efficient and intervening cause, or sole proximate cause of the injuries, in order to avoid liability.

Tex.—Natatorium Laundry Co. v. Saylors, Civ.App., 131 S.W.2d 790, error dismissed, judgment correct.

(2) Where nine year old boy was burned while playing on vacant lot when inflammable waste product which his companion had procured in a small can from a bucket standing near defendant's incinerator adjacent to lot came in contact with open fire which children had built, there was direct connection between defendant's negligence in leaving product available to children and boy's injury, and if can was blown into fire by wind, the wind was not an "intervening cause" but was a "concurring cause."

U.S.—Alligator Co. v. Dutton, C.C.A. Mo., 109 F.2d 900.

(3) Act of adult third party in attaching dynamite cap taken by children from basement to magneto and placing it in plaintiff's hands was held not to break causal connection between negligence of defendant leaving caps exposed and plaintiff's injury.

22.10 W.Va.—McKinney v. Miller, supra.

Held no intervening cause

(1) Act of a child causing explosion or ignition of inherently dangerous commodity which is left in a place accessible to children or where they are wont to congregate is not such an intervening cause as will relieve owner of such commodity from liability for a breach of his duty. Ill.—Zazkowski v. Choyce, 59 N.E.2d 324, 324 Ill.App. 582.

(2) Acts of a 17-year-old trespasser in removing from defendant's premises apparently abandoned dynamite of such character as to have been reasonably expected or foreseeable.^{22,15} Where explosives are wrongfully carried away from the place in which they are stored by children capable of understanding the wrongful nature of their act, the negligence in keeping or storing cannot be regarded as the proximate cause of a subsequent injury to the child or other children by their use, where defendant has done nothing to invite or provoke the act of the child and there is nothing in the circumstances which would cause it to be foreseen.²³ So, likewise, the maintenance of a nuisance in the storage of explosives cannot be regarded as the proximate cause of an injury to a child occurring after explosives have been wrongfully taken by him from the premises.²⁴

These rules apply as well where the child originally taking the explosives gives them to other children who injure themselves;²⁵ but where defendant knowingly permits children to take dangerous dynamite caps from its premises, it must anticipate the probable result that they will be exploded by them or their playmates, causing injury.²⁶

An act by a child too young to know what he is doing will not constitute an intervening cause.²⁷ Where a child, through defendant's original negligent act, has obtained possession of explosives and his parent, with knowledge of their character and of the fact that he has them in his possession, fails to take them away from him, the causal connection between defendant's act and a subsequent injury to the child is broken,²⁸ but the parent must have had knowledge of the character of the article.²⁹

Concurring negligence

Where unexploded dynamite caps were found by plaintiff and his brother, and one exploded, causing injury, after an examination of a cap by his mother, who, apparently without knowledge of its dangerous character, handed it back to the boys, the mother's act was one of concurring negligence, and did not break the causal connection between the defendant's negligence and the injury.

for an injury resulting therefrom in the absence of negligence on his part,³⁰ and, conversely, he is liable for injuries resulting from his negligence.³¹ The liability for negligence extends not only to the purchaser, but also to those who are handling the article in the usual and necessary course of the purchaser's business.³²

A manufacturer is held to a higher degree of care than a dealer in putting dangerous compounds on the market, since he knows, and the dealer is not presumed to know, the formula by which the compound is made, or whether it is inherently dangerous,³³ the dealer, or seller, being under no obligation to test articles manufactured or packed by others for the purpose of discovering latent dangers or defects.³⁴ So the manufacturer of an explosive is responsible to one injured by its use without a showing that he knew it to be unsafe and dangerous and either concealed the defects or represented them as safe and sound,³⁵ although this rule does not apply where the article is not inherently dangerous;³⁶ nor is it any defense that he procured it from an-

Acid

(1) Party selling sulphuric acid is required to use degree of care commensurate with the dangers thereof, and, where the purchaser and its employee did not know the specific gravity or the degrees of heat of the sulphuric acid delivered, they had a right to presume that the acid would be delivered to them in a safe condition. So, where a truck driver received a steel drum of sulphuric acid from defendant and hauled it a distance of about a mile which consumed about ten minutes and it was unloaded and moved and then exploded, there was no intervening cause which would relieve defendant of liability for its negligence, but defendant's act in placing hot acid in a metal drum and closing it up was the proximate cause of the accident.

other, instead of having it compounded on his own premises, where he represented himself as the manufacturer.³⁷ However, a dynamite and cap manufacturer is not responsible as manufacturer as to another manufacturer's fuse sold because dynamite, caps, and fuse form an essential combination for blasting work.³⁸

One who sells gasoline or other explosive oil must use ordinary care,³⁹ as in distributing it in reasonably safe containers,⁴⁰ or in transferring it from one receptacle to another.⁴¹ The care required is such care as is commensurate with the danger.⁴² If the seller fails to exercise the required care, he is liable for resulting injuries;⁴³ but there can be no re-ligence in giving such instructions in connection with the sale of its products.^{47.5}

b. Failure to Give Notice, Misrepresentation, or Concealment of Character

The seller of an explosive substance, knowing its nature, must give the purchaser notice of its dangerous character or he will be liable, irrespective of contract, for injuries proximately resulting to innocent persons not themselves at fault.

The seller of an explosive substance, knowing its nature, must give the purchaser notice of its dangerous character, by a proper label or otherwise, or he will be liable for injuries resulting to innocent persons who are not themselves at fault.⁴⁸ A dealer may be liable under an implied warranty that articles sold by him are fit for the particular purpose, on condition that the specific instructions on the containers are complied with,^{48.5} and where a dealer gives instructions differing from those given by the manufacturer, he cannot escape liability because the manufacturer's instructions were not followed.^{48.10}

taining a high explosive, under the label, guise, or name of kerosene, illuminating oil, or other low explosive, is liable for injuries resulting from its explosion in ordinary use according to its appearance;⁴⁹ and one who sells or places on the market explosive or highly inflammable stove polish, without any warning on the label or other notice of its dangerous character, is liable for any injuries resulting from such negligence.⁵⁰

There can be no recovery, in such cases, unless the negligence of the vendor was the proximate cause of the injury,⁵¹ and he had knowledge of the danger or defect,⁵² or should have had such knowledge if ordinary prudence had been exercised by him or his servants;⁵³ but there need not be any contractual relation between the vendor and the person injured in consequence of his negligence,⁵⁴ especially where there is an affirmative misrepresentation of safety.⁵⁵

pendent of negligence or making a violation negligence per se. The statutory requirements are to be construed according to the ordinary meaning of the language employed.

The liability of a vendor of explosives may be controlled by express provisions of statutes which define his duty toward a purchaser, in using proper brands and labels, and maintaining proper standards of explosives,⁵⁶ and which may impose liability independent of negligence,⁵⁷ or make a violation negligence per se.⁵⁸ Under at least one statute, for liability to be imposed for injuries sustained as a result of a violation of the statute, there must be a recognizably practical or reasonable connection between the violation and the accident.^{58.5}

Where a statute requires oils to be inspected or tested before sale, the duty to test and inspect cannot be delegated to an undisclosed manufacturer residing outside of the state,⁵⁹ and a vendor selling in violation thereof is liable to the purchaser for any damages caused by the use of such oils.⁶⁰ A statute prohibiting the sale or the offering for sale of oils below test is not violated by the keeping of such oils for illumination or other use.⁶¹ Compliance with such statutes by proper inspection, tests, and branding, as required, will relieve from liability, unless negligence otherwise is shown.⁶² Ignorance of the dangerous character of oil, sold in violation of statute, is no defense.⁶³

Where, in violation of statute, one sells gasoline in an unmarked container, and the gasoline explodes when a blowtorch is placed near it, it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the injury resulting to one standing nearby was unforeseeable.^{63.5} A statute making it unlawful to sell any kerosene in a receptacle painted red does not make it unlawful to deliver kerosene to a purchaser who furnishes a red can as a receptacle therefor.⁶⁴

The statutory requirements constitute a legislative declaration of the minimum of care necessary un-

Fact that oil company had violated the statute in failing to have its products tested by the state oil inspector did not make it liable per se for damages resulting from explosion of a product sold by it, but that fact, coupled with fact that none of the product sold was available for testing after explosion, could be considered by the jury in reaching their verdict for persons damaged by the explosion.

der the circumstances, and a lesser degree is negligence as a matter of law.⁶⁵ Such requirements are to be construed according to the ordinary meaning of the language employed.⁶⁶ The statutes do not abrogate the defense of contributory negligence of the person injured, where such negligence is the proximate cause of the injury.⁶⁷ Where the failure to comply with the statutory requirements was not the proximate cause of the injury complained of, however, it has been held that the vendor was not liable.⁶⁸

d. Liability to Subsequent Purchasers

The liability of a wholesale dealer or manufacturer who sells explosives in violation of statute or with knowledge, and without warning, of their dangerous character is not confined to the immediate purchaser, but extends to subsequent purchasers.

Where a wholesaler dealer or manufacturer sells oil or other explosives in violation of statute, or with knowledge, and without warning, of their dangerous character, his liability is not confined to the immediate purchaser, but extends to subsequent purchasers;⁶⁹ nor is he absolved from such liability by negligence of the retail dealer in selling such explosive or failing to warn his customers after discovering the dangerous character thereof.⁷⁰

It may be shown that the adulteration of oil was the result of improper manufacture, as well as of ad-

mixture after manufacture.⁷¹ The manufacturer or wholesaler is not liable, however, unless there is proof that the adulteration of the oil, or other negligence charged, occurred before its delivery to the retailer;⁷² and, although a manufacturer has been accustomed to supply a merchant with petroleum for sale to his customers, he is under no obligation to such customers to continue furnishing it, but may, with the consent of such merchant, supply gasoline instead.⁷³

A retail dealer in illuminating oils, or a consumer purchasing from him, is not chargeable, as a matter of law, with knowledge that naphtha is highly explosive, so as to relieve the original seller from liability.⁷⁴

e. Selling to Infant or Incapable Person

The seller of explosives, including intrinsically dangerous fireworks, to children, or others, whom he knows to be incapable of taking proper care of them, is liable for injuries resulting from their improper use by such persons as the natural and probable consequence of the sale.

If one sells gunpowder or other explosives to children, or to others whom he knows to be incapable of taking proper care of them, he is liable for injuries resulting from their improper use by such persons;⁷⁵ and a license to sell explosives is no defense for selling to an infant or one incapable of proper care.⁷⁶ The seller will not be liable, however, unless the injury is the natural and probable consequence of the sale;⁷⁷ but the mere fact that there was an intervening agency between the original wrong of selling an explosive to a child and the injury does not exonerate the seller, if the injury was the natural and probable result of the sale.⁷⁸

Violation of statute

The sale of any cartridge, gunpowder, or other dangerous and explosive substance to a person under sixteen years of age in violation of statute is "negligence per se" and renders seller liable for any natural or probable harmful result which might follow in wake of his wrongful acts.

Fireworks. The sale to a child of tender years of fireworks which are intrinsically dangerous is an actionable wrong for which the seller will be held liable in case damage results to the child as a proximate consequence thereof,⁷⁹ the duty of the dealer being measured not only by what he actually knew of the nature of the fireworks, but by what he should have known in the exercise of due care.⁸⁰ While a "sparkler," intended for the use of children, and consisting in part of a substance or chemical mixture which gives off sparks when lighted, is a mild explosive,⁸¹ it is not inherently or imminently dangerous,⁸² and a person, other than a manufacturer, selling such an article is not liable for an injury to a child from its use in the absence of proof of knowledge on his part of some concealed danger, not apparent from mere inspection.⁸³ While this rule has been extended to the manufacturer or wholesaler of such an article,⁸⁴ it has been held that the manufacturer is charged with the duty of giving a reasonable warning of the dangers which would naturally follow, and which a person of ordinary sense and understanding would apprehend as likely to follow, the use of the article for fireworks, and is liable for an injury resulting from a failure to give the necessary instructions and warning as to the use of the article.⁸⁵

§ 7. — Use in General

While the rule of absolute liability has been laid down in some cases, the general rule is that one whose business requires the use of explosives must exercise care commensurate with the danger, or the highest degree of care, and is liable for injuries proximately caused by his negligence.

There is authority to the effect that one using explosives, such as dynamite, under such circumstances as to cause a likelihood of risk to others does so at his peril and is an insurer absolutely liable if damage results to third persons either from the direct impact of objects thrown out by the explosion or from concussion, and irrespective of negligence in, or illegality of, use;⁸⁶ but the more general rule is that one whose business requires the use of explosives must use such care and caution in handling or guarding them as reasonably prudent and careful persons whose business requires the use of such explosives ordinarily exercise,⁸⁷ and

79. "Mine"

To sell a so-called "mine," which is a form of fireworks that explodes with violence and sends a flame to a great height, to children about eight years old, is an actionable wrong for which the seller will be held liable in case damage results to a child as the proximate consequence, particularly where the clerk of the seller informs children purchasing the same that it is a harmless, familiar form of red fire. So, where the sale is made to a young girl whom plaintiff accompanied, the two being under nine years of age, and plaintiff is injured, making the sale to the girl does not free defendant from liability.

A duty is imposed to take every proper precaution to prevent personal injury to those lawfully on the user's premises.⁹³ A bare licensee, however, is not entitled to the care due to an owner or tenant, but only to notice of concealed explosives or hidden dangers.⁹⁴ Although an individual or corporation using or storing explosives owes no duty of active vigilance to anticipate danger and warn a trespasser,⁹⁵ when his presence and danger are known, liability for negligence or an intentional explosion cannot be avoided on the ground that he is a trespasser.⁹⁶

Whether gasoline is considered as not an inherently dangerous material,⁹⁷ or is considered as a dangerous substance,^{97.5} great care must be exercised in its use and handling,⁹⁸ particularly in the proximity of a light or fire.⁹⁹ Great care must also be exercised in the use and handling of combustible gases and petroleum.^{99.5} It has been held that pouring kerosene directly from a can upon a fire constitutes negligence per se;^{99.10} but other authorities have held that the use of kerosene to start a fire is not negligence^{99.15} or negligence per se.^{99.20} It is negligence for an unskilled and uninformed man to use a quantity of disinfectant which produces an explosive mixture, under certain circumstances liable to explode, where it would not be used by a man familiar with its qualities.¹

The negligence alleged in the improper use of the explosive, or failure to instruct concerning its use, must be the proximate cause of the injury, in order to warrant recovery.²

§ 8. — Blasting

- a. In general
- b. Violation of statute or ordinance
- c. Conduct of nuisance
- d. Negligence
- e. Blasting by independent contractor

a. In General

As blasting is considered intrinsically dangerous and ultrahazardous, where it is negligently done, the person responsible is liable for ensuing injury to the person or property of another; and as a general rule, although there is some authority to the contrary, one lawfully engaged in blasting is liable, irrespective of negligence, for personal injuries or property damage sustained either as a result of casting material on adjoining land or as the result of concussion.

Blasting is considered intrinsically dangerous;^{4.50} it is an ultrahazardous activity,^{4.55} at least in populated surroundings, or in the vicinity of dwelling places or places of business,^{4.60} since it requires the use of high explosives and since it is impossible to predict with certainty the extent or severity of its consequences.^{4.65} Nevertheless, it is not, under all circumstances, condemned as being negligence as a matter of law,⁵ and may be lawfully done,⁶ provided injury to persons or property is avoided,⁷ and subject to the obligation to pay damages for any injury inflicted by the blasting.⁸ Where blasting is negligently carried on, the person responsible therefor is liable for ensuing injury to the person⁹ or property¹⁰ of others.

There is a conflict of authority as to whether negligence must be present so as to impute liability on the person doing the blasting.^{10.5} Under what has been called the rule of absolute or strict liability, one lawfully engaged in blasting operations is, according to the weight of authority, liable without regard to the question of whether or not he has been negligent, where by his acts in casting rocks or other debris on adjoining or neighboring premises or highways he causes direct damage to prop-

quential injuries occasioned by concussion or vibration to persons,¹⁴ without the actual casting of material; nor is the rule restricted in application to instances where the blasting is a nuisance per se¹⁵ or where the property is contiguous or adjoining.¹⁶

The rule of strict liability has been limited, however, to consequences which lie within the extraordinary risk whose existence calls for such responsibility^{16.5} or are directly attributable to it;^{16.10} and a user is thus not liable for every occurrence

following an explosion which has a semblance of connection with it.^{16.15} Likewise, an owner is not liable for injuries caused by the improper blasting on his land by a trespasser who was taking property without authority.^{16.20} By some authorities the rule imposing liability for injuries occasioned without negligence is limited to cases of direct injury, and negligence must be established to impose liability for consequential injuries, as by concussion or vibration, to property¹⁷ or persons.¹⁸

Ky.—Hieber v. Central Kentucky

By some authorities the rule is apparently laid down that negligence must be present in all cases, even where there is direct injury to property¹⁹ or persons.²⁰ However, it has also been held, to the contrary, that the use of explosives for blasting on a lot located in a large city is such an unusual, unreasonable, and unnatural use of the property that no degree of care or skill can excuse the owner from damages proximately caused to the property of another, whether caused by falling debris²¹ or by concussion,²² and, further, that, where a death was caused by an explosion of a blast in a thickly settled portion of the city, no degree of care will relieve defendant from liability;²³ but as to the last point there is authority to the contrary effect.^{23.5} Where the injury to the person, although direct, is not occasioned while he is in his own home, it is held that the person injured must show either that the blasting was being carried on in a thickly populated portion of the city²⁴ or, if elsewhere, that there was a failure to give reasonable warning of the blast.²⁵

Defendant is not liable for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff as a result of glass falling out of a window several days after the window was broken by rocks blasted by defendant, where defendant was not authorized by the property owner to repair the window.²⁶ Mere concussion of the air without other injury will not impose liability where blasting is lawfully conducted.²⁷

As to persons on his premises and rightfully so, the person using explosives in blasting in a lawful and proper manner is liable only in case of negligence,²⁸ and need exercise only ordinary care.²⁹ The rule that one who, by blasting, throws rock and material on the adjacent land of his neighbor is liable for the damage resulting from such act without regard to the question of negligence, has no application where the person blasting has the right to the use of the land on which the blasted material is thrown.³⁰

Existence of easement. Where defendant has, by law or contract, acquired an easement as against plaintiff's premises, which expressly or impliedly authorizes the operation of blasting, either directly or as a reasonably necessary incident to some other lawful purpose, liability arises only as the result of some proximate negligence on the part of defendant;³¹ but this rule does not apply to persons rightfully on the land subject to the easement with the permission of the owner thereof and the knowledge of defendant.³²

Legislative authority. Whether liability will attach for injuries occasioned by blasting without negligence under legislative authority is a matter as to which there is some conflict of authority, liability having been imposed³³ and denied,³⁴ in accordance with general principles considered in Actions § 15 b (5).

What law governs. As respects liability for damages done to property in one state by blasting done in another state without negligence, the law of the former state governs.³⁵

Dynamite caps are dangerous per se.^{35.5}

b. Violation of Statute or Ordinance

Failure to comply with applicable municipal and statutory regulations as to blasting is evidence of negligence, or may be actionable.

Failure to comply with municipal or statutory regulations as to blasting³⁶ as, for example, requirements of notice³⁷ or that blasts shall be covered,³⁸ is evidence of negligence. A statute defining the offense of recklessly using blasting powder whereby any human being is endangered refers to neglectful, indifferent, or rashly negligent acts,³⁹ and is applicable to civil actions to recover damages for injuries resulting from blasting operations.⁴⁰

A violation of a provision of an administrative code requiring the use of at least a specified number of timbers in blasting operations may be shown to have had no causal relation to plaintiff's damage.^{40.5}

A statute prohibiting the discharge of firecrackers and other explosives within a town without a local permit does not apply to the use of explosives in the course of business, such as dynamite in construction work,⁴¹ and a statute providing that a proprietor may not do work on land causing damage to his neighbor does not apply where defendant exploded dynamite nine miles from plaintiff's residence.⁴² A statute requiring a permit to use explosives for blasting does not enlarge the common-law duty to prosecute the operations with due care.⁴³

c. Conduct of Nuisance

Where blasting constitutes a nuisance, damages may be recovered, although negligence is not shown.

Where blasting operations are conducted in such a manner as to constitute a nuisance, a recovery may be had for damages occasioned, although negligence is not established.⁴⁴

d. Negligence

(1) In general

(2) Duty to warn or to cover blast

One engaged in blasting must, to avoid liability based on negligence, use reasonable care and skill with regard to the nature of the work and local conditions, and must have the most cautious regard for his neighbors' rights.

The degree of care required of one engaged in blasting to avoid liability based on negligence is reasonable care and skill with regard to the nature of the work and local conditions.⁴⁵ One may conduct on his own premises blasting operations from which injury may be apprehended to the property of the neighbors only with the most cautious regard for their rights.⁴⁶

In determining whether or not there has been negligence, the question of the expense required to take proper precautions is not material.⁴⁷ Negligence may be inferred from the fact that the explosion is attended with a violent and unusual result.⁴⁸ Where one, in doing certain blasting within a city, injures property of another, the fact that the former has fully complied with the regulations of the city authorities as to the manner in which the blasting should be done will not relieve him of liability if the blasting was done without due care.⁴⁹

Excessive amount of explosives. Whether an excessive amount of explosives is used constitutes one test of negligence in the use of explosives;^{49,5} and the use of excessive explosives when blasting is actionable negligence when it results in injury to adjoining property.^{49,10}

(2) Duty to Warn or to Cover Blast

Persons engaged in blasting should give timely warning to all those who may reasonably be expected to be within the range; and, according to the surrounding circumstances, failure to cover a blast may or may not be negligence.

It is the duty of persons engaged in blasting to give notice in season to those who may reasonably be expected to be within the range of an explosion,⁵⁰ and this rule applies to persons on their

High degree of care

Defendant who was in charge of blasting operation was bound to furnish plaintiff who operated battery with a reasonably safe place to work, and it was also defendant's duty to instruct and caution plaintiff concerning a danger of which plaintiff was excusably ignorant. Nothing short of a high degree of care, gauged by the care and prudence that careful and prudent men would exercise in like circumstances, would be commensurate with the dangerous character of the explosive, since dynamite is as a matter of law a dangerous agency.

Duty to investigate or inspect

(1) Exploder of dynamite was under duty to investigate adjacent property where force of explosion might be spent.

Vt.—Thompson v. Green Mountain Power Corp., 144 A.2d 786, 120 Vt. 478.

(2) Where it was contemplated that following blasting in slush pit, work should be done in pit that presence of unexploded dynamite therein would render highly dangerous, ordinary care would entail of those doing the blasting an immediate inspection to ascertain whether all dynamite was exploded.

Use of standard, modern methods

Sewer contractor, constructing sewer for city, was liable for damage to building from blasting in street, where he did not use a standard, modern method of doing such work.

Less dangerous forces compared Greater care must be exercised by those who use dynamite or other high explosive than is required in the use of less dangerous forces.

Knowledge

That defendant's agent did not know he was using more dynamite than was reasonably necessary would not relieve defendant from liability if agent knew quantity used would probably injure plaintiffs' property. Ala.—Birmingham Gas Co. v. Sanford, 145 So. 485, 226 Ala. 129.

premises,⁵¹ and to all persons within the circle of danger,⁵² even though such persons were on a road which had been closed by the state highway department.⁵³

Where only ordinary care is owed to plaintiff, he cannot complain of the fact that notice was not given to him that blasts were about to be fired where, at the time he went on the premises, he had heard blasting and understood that it was being carried on.⁵⁴ It is not the duty of one blasting on his own premises to inform all of the adjoining proprietors when he is about to set off a blast in order to avoid consequential injury.⁵⁵

Covering blast. Where persons blasting know, or by reasonable diligence may know, that injury will probably result, they should protect the persons exposed to danger by covering the blasts or warning them so that they may seek a place of safety.⁵⁶ Failure to cover a blast may or may not be negligence as a matter of law, according to the surrounding circumstances.⁵⁷ Where one engaged in blasting has not been in the custom of covering blasts, he is not required to do so by the fact that he allows persons to come on the premises where the blasting is being done, they having knowledge of the circumstances and manner of conducting the work.⁵⁸ Failure to fill a trench in order to lessen the noise of an explosion cannot be held to be negligent where it is not shown to be a proper, usual, or reasonable thing to do.⁵⁹

Generally, both the independent contractor and his employer are liable for injuries resulting from blasting operations conducted by an independent contractor.

An independent contractor employed to conduct blasting operations is liable for injuries resulting therefrom, since it is the effect of the use of an instrumentality irrespective of ownership that determines the character of the injury and liability therefor.⁶⁰ While he must act with due regard

Agreement to pay damages

(1) A contractor performing municipal work is not liable, without proof of negligence, in an action of trespass for damage caused by concussion and vibrations of blasting operations, unless he has voluntarily assumed the liability, but, where contract between municipality and contractor provided that latter should make good any damage caused by blasting, landowners would be entitled to recover against him in action of trespass for damage to buildings caused by blasting without pleading negligence. In such action, however, where contract between city and contractor should have been excluded on objection thereto because not pleaded, recovery could not be had on the theory of a direct trespass without proving negligence.

(2) Where a contractor, by terms of a contract with municipal sanitary district for construction of an intercepting sewer, agreed to pay, at contractor's own expense, for all injury to persons or property arising in connection with construction work, a showing of negligence by contractor was not necessary to support a cause of action against contractor for personal injuries and property damage allegedly sustained by plaintiffs from explosions and subsidence of soil in connection with construction work.

(2) However, where independent contractors were engaged in blasting operations for United States government under contract and used blasting methods approved by government, they were entitled to same immunity from suit as the United States itself for others,^{60.5} it has been held that an independent contractor will not be held liable in the absence of negligence,^{60.10} unless there is an agreement that he shall be responsible for such damage without fault.^{60.15} The refusal of an adjoining landowner to allow an inspection of his premises before and during the blasting does not affect the contractor's liability.^{60.20}

There is authority, based on the general rule as to nonliability of the contractee stated in Master and Servant § 584, to the effect that a principal is not liable for the negligence of an independent contractor, although the work to be done is intrinsically dangerous, as long as no negligence can be imputed to him in employing such contractor, and the work itself is lawful and will not necessarily result in injury to another;⁶¹ but the well recognized exception to the general rule, which is stated in Master and Servant § 590, has been applied in cases of injuries resulting from blasting operations, and, accordingly, it has been frequently held that a city or other employer cannot delegate its duty of care in work intrinsically dangerous, such as blasting, or by contract escape liability for the negligence of its independent contractor.⁶² So, where the work is done as contemplated, the employer is held liable⁶³ as a joint wrongdoer, in some jurisdictions;⁶⁴ and, particularly, where the injury results from defective plans or methods of using explosives, or from blasting in a manner expressly authorized by the employer or from acts necessary to the performance of the contract, or from carrying on blasting where the work required is intrinsically dangerous, the employer is responsible.⁶⁵ An employer also incurs liability where he contracts for blasting with one whom he knows to be unskilled or negligent or in the habit of blasting in violation of an ordinance.⁶⁶ So, too, where the blasting is unlawful, or constitutes a nuisance, the employer is liable for the acts of an independent contractor.⁶⁷

An assistant to a contractor personally directing an explosion or preparations therefor may be liable as a joint tort-feasor.⁶⁸ Where the parties conducting the blasting are master and servant, instead of employer and independent contractor, and the em-

§ 9. — Transportation

Common carriers and others who transport explosives must use care commensurate with the danger, and are liable to those injured through their negligence or where the shipment has become a nuisance. Shippers are liable for injuries resulting from their own negligence.

In the absence of negligence on its part, a common carrier is not liable to third persons injured through its transportation of explosives in the performance of its duty to receive and transport freight of such character.⁷⁰ It is, however, liable to those injured through its negligence⁷¹ or where it has so handled the shipment that it has become a nuisance.⁷²

The carrier is bound to exercise reasonable and ordinary care for the safety of the persons and property of the general public,⁷³ that is, care commensurate with the danger,⁷⁴ or such care and prudence as prudent and careful persons whose business it is to deal in such articles ordinarily exercise;⁷⁵ but, if a carrier is uninformed as to the dangerous character of an explosive package, it is not negligence to handle it as similar looking packages are handled.⁷⁶

Statutory regulations as to the manner in which explosives shall be handled and transported do not impliedly absolve the carrier from the necessity of employing care commensurate with the risk of danger.⁷⁷ Rules of the interstate commerce commission governing the handling and marking of shipments of explosives have been held to be designed for the protection and safety of railway employees and the public,⁷⁸ and their violation to give the consignee no right of action for damages sustained from an explosion after delivery of the shipment,⁷⁹ particularly where the act of congress empowered the commission to formulate rules and regulations governing shipments "in transit," which means in course of passage from one point to another, so that after delivery of the shipment to the consignee the rules of the commission cease to have any application.⁸⁰ Where a tanker is having its tanks cleaned and gas-freed by a professional tank cleaning company, the Coast Guard regulation requiring all vessels with combustible liquid cargo on board to have flame screens on when hatches are open is inapplicable, since the vessel has already discharged its cargo.^{80.5}

The shipper is not liable for the negligence of the carrier, as against the contention that the transportation of explosives is so ultrahazardous that the shipper cannot delegate to an independent contractor his duty to protect the public.^{80.10} A carrier is not required to ascertain the competency of a minor consignee to receive a shipment unless it has reason to believe that it would be dangerous to deliver the shipment, so that it is not liable for injuries subsequently sustained.^{80.15}

One who transports gasoline on the public highways must exercise that degree of care which an ordinarily prudent and cautious person would exercise under like or similar circumstances; that is to say, he must use care commensurate with the danger, but he is not liable for injuries in the absence of negligence.⁸¹ It is not actionable negligence for one driving an automobile loaded with explosives, who discovers that the automobile is on fire through no fault of his, to abandon it on a steep hill which he cannot surmount.⁸²

Acts of shipper. To impose liability on a shipper because of the transportation of explosives, it must be shown that it was done negligently or under such circumstances as to create a public nuisance.^{82.5} Where a shipper fails so to mark explosives as to notify those who handle them of their dangerous character, he is liable to those injured by his negligence by reason of such failure,⁸³ and this is true even though the failure properly to mark the goods is in accordance with an agreement between the shipper and the carrier.⁸⁴ Violation of a statute requiring proper marking, however, will not create an absolute liability on the part of the person who violates it.^{84.5} A statute requiring the shipper to mark and give notice of the dangerous character of explosive or inflammable goods which imposes only a criminal penalty will not support a civil action without specific allegation of matter giving rise to a cause of action at common law.⁸⁵

One who is both manufacturer and shipper is not liable to third persons injured in the transportation of explosives where the transportation did not constitute a nuisance and the manufacturer and shipper was not negligent;^{85.5} but one who is both manufacturer and shipper is liable for injury resulting from the inadequacy of the container.^{85.10} Where explosives are shipped in tank cars furnished by the

§ 10. — Discharge of Fireworks

- a. In general
- b. Negligence

a. In general

One who discharges fireworks unlawfully or in a manner constituting a nuisance is liable, without regard to negligence, for injuries proximately resulting therefrom; and one who negligently discharges fireworks is likewise liable, although his act is not in itself unlawful or a nuisance.

One who unlawfully discharges fireworks,⁸⁹ or discharges them in such a manner as to amount to a nuisance,⁹⁰ is liable for ensuing injury without regard to the question of his negligence. Where, however, the act is not in itself unlawful or a nuisance, liability must be predicated on negligence.⁹¹ So, although the discharge of fireworks at suitable places, when not prohibited by statute or municipal regulations, cannot be said to be unlawful,⁹² the circumstances may be such as to make the act of discharging them actionable negligence.⁹³

One who unlawfully discharges fireworks on a public highway is responsible for all injury to persons or property occasioned thereby to those traveling thereon.⁹⁴ A distinction, however, has been drawn between voluntary spectators present merely for the purpose of witnessing the display of fireworks and travelers on the highway, it being held that the spectators can recover only on proof of negligence, although the discharge was unauthorized.⁹⁵

The promoters of a fireworks display, which may become a nuisance by reason of the place where and the manner in which it is conducted, may be held personally liable for damages for resulting personal injuries.⁹⁶ Where premises commonly used as a playground for children are leased by defendant for an exhibition of fireworks, defendant is under a duty to use reasonable care to have the grounds cleared of unexploded bombs after the exhibition.⁹⁷

Private parks and places of amusement. It is not unlawful or a nuisance per se to give a fireworks exhibition and shoot off skyrockets, bombs, and other explosives in a careful and suitable manner on one's own premises.⁹⁸ The owner or manager of a park or other place of amusement who gives an exhibition of fireworks therein must use the care and prudence exercised by an ordinarily prudent and intelligent man to protect not only his guests and patrons,⁹⁹ but all others,¹ from unnecessary risks from the discharge or attempted discharge of such fireworks, and he must provide a reasonably safe place for spectators, at a proper distance;² but he is liable only in case of negligence or failure to use reasonable care in regard to such matters as are known or should reasonably be known.³ An individual or corporation, giving a fireworks exhibition on its own grounds, is liable for negligence where bombs or other explosives fall outside of its grounds and there cause injury to others.⁴ There may also be liability for injuries sustained when children take unguarded fireworks from the premises and explode them.^{4,5}

Proximate cause. There can be no recovery for injuries from fireworks unless the act of defendant was the proximate cause of the injury.⁵ One who merely permits the display of fireworks on his private grounds, but who does not procure or explode them is not liable for an injury caused by them to one who complains only of their quality and the manner in which they are handled.⁶

Liability on bond. A bond given by a licensed exhibitor of fireworks, as required by statute, conditioned for the payment of all damages caused either to persons or property by reason of the display and arising from any acts of the licensee or his agents, is not limited to liability caused by negligence, but is, in effect, an accident insurance policy, and, where a wife was injured by the display and her husband incurred medical expenses and other kindred damages, both the husband and wife can recover on the bond without proving negligence on the part of the licensee, and without proceeding against the licensee.⁷

Negligence may lie in the character of the fireworks used, as well as in the method of their discharge. One having no control over the details of a display is not liable for the negligence of an independent contractor exhibiting fireworks; but a parent may be liable for injuries resulting from a negligent use of fireworks by a child.

Negligence in the discharge of fireworks may lie in the character of the fireworks used on the particular occasion, as well as in the method of their discharge.⁸ So, where rockets of large size are employed, they should be used only in such places, and under such circumstances, as to involve no reasonable chance that their heavy cases will fall on human beings.⁹ It is actionable negligence so to fire bombs that they will fall on a spectator standing where he is expected to stand to view a display of fireworks.¹⁰

Negligence of independent contractor. The owner or manager of an amusement park, having no control over the details of a display, is not liable for the negligence of an independent contractor hired to exhibit fireworks.¹¹

Liability for negligence of infants. Where a parent, through lack of care or watchfulness, permits an infant of tender age to discharge fireworks, he is liable for injuries resulting from a negligent use of them.¹²

§ 11(2). — — — Defenses

- a. In general
- b. Contributory negligence

a. In General

In actions for injuries from explosives, the defense of assumption of risk has been held recognized where applicable. Facts and circumstances held not to constitute defenses include the fact that no similar accident has occurred under like conditions, the unreasonableness of regulations governing the handling of explosives, and ignorance of such regulations or of the character of material.

A number of matters involving defenses to actions for injuries from explosives have already been considered, supra §§ 4-10, in connection with the question of the existence of a cause of action.

The defense of assumption of risk has been recognized in an action for injuries resulting from an explosion.¹⁷ It is available when there has been a voluntary acceptance of a risk and such acceptance, express or implied, has been made with knowledge and appreciation of the risk;^{17.5} if there is no knowledge of the risks, the doctrine is not applicable.^{17.10} Defenses based on a theory of assumption of risk have been unavailable in the absence of a relation of master and servant,¹⁸ and even notwithstanding such relation, where it appears that the employer has been negligent;¹⁹ but the master's negligence does not bar the defense of assumption of risk if the servant continues in the employment with knowledge of the employer's negligence,^{19.5} or if the servant, in the exercise of ordinary care could have known of the unsafe condition of the premises or the appliances.^{19.10} Moreover, the defense is unavailable if the employer

Discovery of gasoline

Employees of independent contractor engaged to clean gasoline stor-

fails to disclose unknown extraordinary hazards to an independent contractor in the absence of the latter's familiarity with the risks likely to be encountered. 19.15

The statute of limitation applicable to negligence actions based on reckless or wanton misconduct is not a defense where the action is based on absolute liability for blasting. 19.20

The fact that no similar accident has occurred under like conditions is not in itself a defense. 20

The alleged unreasonableness of regulations governing the handling of explosive material has been held not available as a defense to an action for injuries resulting from an explosion of such material; 21 nor does ignorance of such regulations constitute a defense. 22 Violation of regulations is not a defense where they are not intended to protect the person who relies on them. 22.5 So, violation of the private safety rules promulgated by an employer for the purpose of protecting its own employees is not a defense in an action against an independent contractor who, through its own negligence, causes an explosion, especially if the contractor was unaware of their existence and did not rely on them. 22.10

Ignorance of the character of material is not an excuse from liability where there is a duty to know its character as far as possible. 23

The fact that the premises on which an explosion occurs formerly belonged to plaintiff and were sold by him with knowledge that explosive material was to be handled thereon does not constitute a defense in an action for injuries resulting from such explosion; 24 nor is it a defense that plaintiff leased or sold a portion of his property to another for the purpose of manufacturing powder, 25 or that other powder magazines were located in the vicinity at the time plaintiff purchased property which was subsequently injured by the explosion of a magazine. 26 The fact that the injured property was not adjacent to the premises on which the explosives were stored will not in itself defeat a recovery. 27

The owner of a munitions plant, in order to be absolved from liability for injuries from an explosion on the ground of government control, must show that such control is absolute. 28

In an action for injuries resulting from negligence in the storage of explosives, a defense that they must be kept accessible for use in defendant's business is not available where it appears that they were not being so used. 29

Claims for property damage from blasting are not barred by a refusal to allow inspection of the interior of plaintiff's building on the ground that such refusal constitutes fraud. 29.5

Failure to comply with the conditions precedent to direct action on the part of the third party beneage tanks would be held to have assumed risk of explosion occurring more than one hour after they had arrived at tank and observed that leaky pump had deposited considerable quantity of gasoline on ground surrounding tank and had filled air with gaseous fumes.

b. Contributory Negligence

Contributory negligence may be available as a defense to an action involving explosives and based on the negligence of defendant.

Where an action for an injury resulting from explosives is based on a theory of defendant's negligence, contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff will constitute a defense,³⁰ provided plaintiff's negligence proximately and appreciably contributed to such injury,³¹ such defense being available, for example, where a recovery is sought for an injury from blasting,³² or for injuries to children by attractive explosives.³³

It has been said, however, that generally contributory negligence is no defense to an action for injuries from the use of an intrinsically dangerous agency, such as an explosive in blasting operations, necessarily exposing plaintiff to probable injury,³⁴ and that it is not available as a defense against a child who is too young to be guilty of contributory negligence,³⁵ or where an action for injuries is based on a violation of statute,³⁶ but as to the last point there is authority to the contrary effect.^{36.5}

Excusable ignorance of the explosive qualities of a substance may preclude one's being guilty of contributory negligence,³⁷ and the fact that acts are done in reliance on statements of defendant that they are safe may prevent them from constituting contributory negligence.³⁸

The handling of gasoline in the proximity of a light or fire may constitute contributory negligence,³⁹ as may lighting a match and throwing it down in the vicinity of an explosive,⁴⁰ or conducting a business in violation of ordinance regulating it.⁴¹ The mere fact that one handles or transports an explosive substance does not, however, constitute contributory negligence;⁴² nor does the fact that the owner of premises strikes a match in a place where he keeps no inflammable material,⁴³ or the failure of the operator to extinguish acetylene lamps on a motor truck while its gas tank is being filled,⁴⁴ or the use of an open flame in thawing a water pipe, near an abandoned gasoline tank,⁴⁵ necessarily constitute contributory negligence. The mere fact that one has noticed gasoline fumes does not as a matter of law establish his contributory negligence in failing to remove his property.⁴⁶

One driving a traction engine from a highway across an exposed pipe line at the side of the highway is not as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery for damages resulting from the breaking of the pipe line and the ignition of escaping oil or gas;⁴⁷ and one injured by the explosion of stove polish while applying it to a heated stove is not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.⁴⁸

Approaching or remaining near danger. Voluntarily approaching or entering into a place of danger may constitute contributory negligence,⁴⁹ as may an employee's sleeping in a gasoline filling station in violation of his employer's express orders.⁵⁰ It is not, however, per se contributory negligence for one to go on premises where a fire is likely to cause an explosion, if he does so in good faith, intending to save life or property,⁵¹ particularly where the injured person enters the dangerous area in pursuance of the duties of his employment.⁵² It is not contributory negligence per se for one to attempt to return to his usual working place after an explosion;⁵³ but the rule is otherwise where one goes voluntarily toward the danger, or through mere curiosity, although he renders some service.⁵⁴

One is not guilty of contributory negligence in living in his home near a magazine, although he has knowledge of its dangerous character,⁵⁵ or in continuing to carry on business nearby after an explosion has occurred.⁵⁶ The mere presence of a person in a crowd that has gathered to see a display of fireworks, in a place where they were expected or invited to stand, is not contributory negligence which deprives him of his right to recover if injured by the negligent or wrongful discharge of fireworks.⁵⁷

One who is entitled to personal and timely notice of blasting is not bound to watch and listen, or exercise any care or vigilance to escape until warned.⁵⁸

Kindling fire with oil or gasoline. The use of kerosene, or other oil which appears to be kerosene, to start a fire, is not in itself contributory negligence, as a matter of law,⁵⁹ and the use of a liquid supposed to be fuel oil in kindling a fire has been held not to constitute contributory negligence, notwithstanding such liquid is poured on an open flame;⁶⁰ but an attempt to revive a dying fire by pouring kerosene from a can,⁶¹ or to kindle a new fire without ascertaining that there is no fire present,⁶² is usually held to be negligence per se.

Disregard of warning. Failure to exercise reasonable care and due diligence to escape injury, after warning of the danger, generally constitutes contributory negligence.⁶³ Thus, where one has been properly warned of a blast or impending danger, and disregards it, or fails to avail himself of means for his own protection, he cannot recover.⁶⁴

§ 11(3). — — Jurisdiction and Venue

A cause of action for injury by negligent blasting accrues in the jurisdiction where the injury occurred. An action for damage to personalty and realty is transitory.

Where one is injured by negligent blasting, the cause of action accrues in the jurisdiction where the injury occurred, although the work is conducted within another jurisdiction.⁶⁶

Where an explosion causes damage to both personalty and realty, the action is transitory in its nature, and defendant may be sued wherever found and served.⁶⁷

§ 11(4). — — Parties

General rules govern questions as to parties in actions involving explosives.

The owners of realty are the real party in interest and may maintain an action for the full amount of damages from blasting, even though a portion of the repair bill has been paid by the owner's insurer.^{67,50} A specific mention, in a statute relating to explosives, of the class of persons to whom the right of action is given for its breach excludes by implication any other class.^{67,55}

Where work is so negligently and improperly performed as to cause injury to adjoining property, a volunteer superintendent in charge of blasting, being a joint tort-feasor with the other persons engaged in the work, may be sued alone.⁶⁸ In an action for injuries resulting from blasting on adjoining land, one who is not shown to be an owner of such land, a contractor doing work thereon, or the person firing or directing the blast is not a proper party defendant;⁶⁹ nor may the consignor be sued for damages caused by explosion of a consignment of gunpowder, to be sold on commission, where the consignee has exclusive control as to storage.⁷⁰ In an action for damage from blasting, brought by plaintiff as the owner of the property, a statute providing that the bare possession of land shall authorize the possessor to recover damages from any person wrongfully interfering with such possession is inapplicable.^{70.5}

In appropriate circumstances, joint liability for damages caused by an explosion may be imputed to a company and its employee,⁷¹ a lessor and his lessee,⁷² a railroad company and a terminal company,⁷³ or two manufacturers⁷⁴ or partners;⁷⁵ and each of those concerned in the maintenance of a powder house or magazine which constitutes a nuisance is liable for damage from its explosion,⁷⁶ whether he acts in the capacity of principal or agent,⁷⁷ owner or lessee,⁷⁸ or consignee using the explosive.⁷⁹ A statute providing for joinder of parties in cases presenting "common questions of law and fact" and "in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions," has been applied so as to permit the joinder, as plaintiffs, of a number of persons claiming per-

§ 11(5). — — — Pleading

- a. In general
- b. Issues, proof, and variance

a. In General

In an action for injuries from explosives, whether based on the theory of negligence, nuisance, or trespass, plaintiff's pleading must contain allegations of fact sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Under the view that liability in tort for injuries arising from explosives must be predicated on either a theory of nuisance or the existence of negligence, see supra § 4, the pleadings in an action for damages resulting from explosives must allege facts showing either a nuisance or negligence.⁸²

If a nuisance is alleged, the facts establishing it must be set forth,^{82.5} such as the quantity and kind of explosives kept, the locality endangered, the protection given, and kind of magazine used;⁸³ but an allegation of negligence is unnecessary.⁸⁴

Where, in an action involving explosives, a recovery is sought on the theory of negligence, negligence must be charged;⁸⁵ the elements of negligence should be stated^{85.5} and the facts constituting it must be pleaded;⁸⁶ but there is no need to

Plaintiff's pleading must also show that the injury complained of was proximately caused by defendant's negligence.⁸⁷ If plaintiff's pleading does not show on its face an independent and efficient intervening cause which, as a matter of law, would prevent the negligence of defendant from being the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries, the pleading sufficiently states a cause of action.^{87.5} When the duty to act is shown, the negligent performance of pass is alleged, allegations of negligence are not required⁹⁰ and will be treated as surplusage.⁹¹ In addition, it has been said that in case of liability for direct injury from blasting operations regardless of negligence, plaintiff need not plead negligence.^{91.5}

Nature of explosive. The kind of explosive should be alleged, without an indefinite alternative such as dynamite "or other explosive,"⁹² although a petition designating the explosive in question "as gasoline or some other highly explosive substance similar to gasoline" has been sustained.⁹³ At any rate, the explosive and its combustion need not be described in technical terms with scientific accuracy, a statement that the substance was dangerous, and likely to ignite with a blaze in the nature of an explosion being sufficient.⁹⁴

Warning; notice. The duty of care or warning must be alleged if it is sought to hold defendant for a negligent breach of such duty,⁹⁵ and not only must a duty be alleged, but specific facts must be set out which raise a legal duty;⁹⁶ but it has been held that where the law implies a duty it is not necessary to aver it in terms.⁹⁷ A complaint alleging that defendant negligently failed to give plaintiff notice of the blast, so as to enable him to escape, has been held sufficient without alleging that defendant knew, or could by reasonable care have known, of plaintiff's presence,⁹⁸ although an allegation of knowledge or reason to believe that plaintiff was within range of missiles has been required.⁹⁹

Attractive nuisance. Where the action is based on the theory that defendant maintained a nuisance attractive to children, it must be alleged that he permitted or induced them to come and play on the premises,¹ that some act or omission of his was the proximate cause of the injury for which the action is brought,² and that he was on notice that children were attracted.³ Where, in addition to the technical trespass on defendant's premises, the injured child commits thereon an act of moral turpitude contributing to his injury, it must be alleged that he was ignorant of the moral culpability of such act.⁴

Contributory negligence. In an action based on negligence, plaintiff may not be required to plead the absence of contributory negligence;⁵ on the other hand, a complaint is not insufficient for disclosing on its face contributory negligence,^{5,5} even where the facts alleged do not constitute such negligence as a matter of law.⁶

Damages. In an action of trespass on the case for damages resulting from blasting, plaintiff's initial pleading must clearly aver that damage resulted to him.⁷ Special damages, such as damages for loss of time, must be alleged,⁸ but one can recover for suffering and anxiety of mind, caused by an injury from negligent blasting, without such special allegation in the complaint.⁹

Supplemental petition. A plaintiff suing for injuries resulting from an explosion allegedly caused by defendant's negligence may properly plead by supplemental petition a defense to contracts set up by defendants in their answer.¹⁰

b. Issues, Proof, and Variance

General rules governing issues, proof, and variance have been applied in actions involving explosives; so, where such an action is based on one theory, evidence is inadmissible to prove another theory.

Under general rules of pleading, matters of inducement are admitted by a plea of the general issue.¹¹ In an action for injuries resulting from an explosion allegedly caused by defendant's negligence, an answer affirmatively alleging that the injuries were proximately caused by plaintiff's own negligence is sufficient to put in issue plaintiff's contributory negligence.¹²

The general rule that the proof must substantially correspond with the allegation applies in actions involving explosives, and if the variance between the cause of action alleged and proved is material, it is fatal to recovery;¹³ but there is no variance if the evidence can be reasonably construed to support the allegations.^{13,5} Recovery is not defeated by a variance in unessential matters, immaterial to the gist of the action;¹⁴ and a variance is immaterial where defendant could not have been misled to his detriment.¹⁵

Where a public nuisance is pleaded, as resulting in special damage to plaintiff, recovery must be on that ground and not on negligence.¹⁶ A plaintiff alleging negligence must prove it in order to recover,¹⁷ and in an action based on negligence, with no averment of trespass, evidence of trespass is inadmissible.¹⁸ Where, however, as discussed supra § 8, one engaged in blasting operations is liable for

The burden is on plaintiff to establish the elements of his cause of action, and defendant may have the burden of establishing contributory negligence. The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable in some circumstances, but not in others.

In an action to recover for injury resulting from explosives, the burden is on plaintiff to establish the elements of his cause of action,²³ including the burden* of proving a legal duty and the violation thereof,^{23.5} as well as an injury suffered by reason of such violation,^{23.10} and the burden of proving that the act relied on is that of defendant or of persons for whose acts he is responsible.²⁴ Accordingly the burden is on the party alleging negligence, or failure to exercise reasonable care, to establish it,²⁵ and, at least where the explosion occurs on premises over which defendant has no control,^{25.5} to prove that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury for which suit is brought.²⁶

Plaintiff has the burden of showing that the explosion occurred from a cause for which defendant would be liable;^{26.5} and if plaintiff has violated an applicable Coast Guard regulation, he has the burden of proving that by no possibility could the violation have contributed to the accident.^{26.10}

It has been held that the mere happening of an explosion, without more, furnishes no basis for a presumption of negligence,^{26.15} and does not set the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur in operation.^{26.20} However, the fact of an explosion may, in particular circumstances, call for the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, or raise a presumption of negligence.²⁷ In other circumstances, the doctrine may be inapplicable, or the presumption not raised.²⁸ So, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is not applica-

Other circumstances; control of instrumentality

Mere fact of explosion, without more, does not bespeak negligence, but if there are other facts and circumstances from which jury may reasonably infer that explosion was caused by a flame or spark emanating from an instrumentality under management and control of the defendants, then their negligence may be inferred.

Requirements for application of doctrine

To entitle plaintiff to recover damages under res ipsa loquitur doctrine, circumstances must not only warrant inference that explosion was result of negligence, but also that such negligence was that of defendants, who must be shown to have been solely responsible for performance of all duties, breach of which by someone must have been proximate cause of explosion.

Okl.—Cosden v. Wright, 211 P.2d 523, 202 Okl. 211.

Specific negligence directly provable

Res ipsa loquitur rule has been held applicable as to cause of gasoline explosion although specific negligence was provable by direct evidence.

Circumstances in which doctrine is inapplicable

Where, from the nature of facts alleged, it is reasonable to assume that an explosion injuring plaintiff may have been caused by the negligence of another than defendant, or through the instrumentality or agency of another, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is without application, nor can the doctrine be invoked when the accident might have happened as a result of two or more causes with some of which defendant had no causal connection.

La.—Shields v. United Gas Pipe Line Co., App., 110 So.2d 881.

Rule of res ipsa loquitur held inapplicable

(1) Generally.

N.C.—Hopkins v. Comer, 81 S.E.2d 368, 240 N.C. 143.

Okl.—Cosden v. Wright, 211 P.2d 523, 202 Okl. 211.

(2) Explosion of oil-fueled heater. Cal.—Zanardi v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co., 284 P.2d 851, 134 C.A.2d 3.

(3) In action for injuries sustained by employee of a service station working on defendant's truck when an explosion occurred when the employee attempted to lift a wire from

ble where the explosive or instrumentality causing the accident is not under the exclusive control or management of defendant,²⁹ or where he has no control at all,^{29.5} where the cause of, or the instrumentality producing, the explosion is unknown, or is conjectural,^{29.10} or where, assuming that all evidence favorable to plaintiff is true, it cannot be said that it is more probable that the injury was caused by defendant's negligence than by any other cause.^{29.15}

The presumption of negligence arising under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is rebuttable, and it is incumbent upon defendant to furnish an explanation of the occurrence, consistent with due care on his part, if he can.^{29.20} It has been said that the courts have seemed less reluctant to apply the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur in explosion cases than in cases of fire.^{29.25}

The capacity, knowledge, experience, and discretion of the injured person appear to be evidentiary matters as to which the parties may adduce evidence, no conclusive presumption being indulged.^{29.30}

Contributory negligence. Subject to the rules prevailing in the particular jurisdiction as to the proof of negligence generally, a presumption has been indulged that the party injured exercised due care, where there are no witnesses on the subject,³⁰ or that he was free from fault;³¹ and defendant may have the burden of proving contributory negligence, the battery of the truck, petition was insufficient to justify the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur; where plaintiff neither designated any agency or instrumentality in possession of defendant nor showed that defendant was better informed as to the cause of the accident than plaintiff, the doctrine could not be invoked. *La.—Shields v. or failure to exercise reasonable care, on the part of plaintiff or the person injured.³²

b. Blasting; Fireworks

One suing for injury from blasting generally has the burden of proving negligence, although the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur may be invoked in a proper case.

Persons suing for injury resulting from blasting have, in general, the burden of proving negligence,³³ and that the injuries or damages complained of are the result of such negligence,^{33.5} or that the negligence directly contributed to the damage;^{33.10} but there is authority for the view that plaintiff is not required to prove negligence in order to recover for property damage caused by blasting, the liability of the user of the explosives being absolute and not predicated on his negligence.^{33.15}

The mere fact that blasting causes injury on adjacent premises gives rise to no presumption that the blasting was negligently done, and does not require the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.³⁴ However, the doctrine may be invoked in a proper case;³⁵ and, where the evidence of the results and surrounding circumstances of a blast shows that under ordinary circumstances such a result could not have occurred unless the blast was negligently performed, a prima facie case of negligence is made out.³⁶

A violent and unusual result from blasting may constitute evidence from which may be inferred a lack of proper care as to the amount of explosive used³⁷ or the manner in which the explosive was placed and discharged,³⁸ this being particularly true where rocks or debris are thrown by the blast.³⁹

The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is not applicable to a delayed explosion of dynamite used in blasting, where workmen were ordered back to work before the final explosion, and negligence is not presumed;⁴⁰ and the doctrine may be excluded from the case by plaintiff's proceeding to allege specific acts of negligence in addition to the fact of the blast.⁴¹

A written notice of intention to blast rock at a certain place,⁴² or giving orders and superintending the blasting,⁴³ is prima facie evidence that the parties are themselves the actors. A foreman or contractor blasting with dynamite or other high explosive is presumed to know the dangers attending its use.⁴⁴

In an action by an invitee against a landowner for personal injuries from blasting operations conducted by independent contractors, their mere presence on the premises does not cast on them the burden of negating plaintiff's case.⁴⁵

Fireworks. Evidence of the dangerous qualities of fireworks, their discharge by defendant, and the injury therefrom raises a presumption of negligence.⁴⁶

c. Manufacture; Sale

One suing for injury from the manufacture or sale of explosives generally has the burden of proving negligence, although the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur may be invoked in a proper case.

According to some authorities, the mere explosion of a factory in which explosives are in the process of manufacture raises a presumption of negligence, or renders applicable the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur so as to remove the necessity for proving negligence,⁴⁷ while others deny that the mere fact of such explosion has such effect.⁴⁸ It is to be presumed that an explosion which occurred in a factory originated there, so that the owner has the burden of proving its inception elsewhere,⁴⁹ and it has been held that negligence will be presumed unless the owner of the factory offers a sufficient explanation.⁵⁰

The mere fact of the explosion of an article not inherently dangerous does not show negligence on the part of the seller who is not a manufacturer and is not shown to have known, or to have had any means of ascertaining, that it contained any substance of an explosive nature not commonly present in such articles,⁵¹ and a similar rule has been applied in an action against a bottling works for injury resulting from the explosion of an article sold as a bottled beverage.⁵² However, an inference of negligence on the part of the manufacturer has been held to arise, or the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to apply, in cases involving the explosion of apparently harmless articles,⁵³ particularly when it is shown that all persons through whose hands such articles subsequently passed were free from fault.⁵⁴ In other circumstances, the doctrine has been held not to apply as against a manufacturer.^{54.5} The fact that a shotgun shell, purchased from a retailer, failed to discharge in the shotgun, but, after being ejected and put back in the barrel, exploded while the breach was still open, and injured plaintiff, is insufficient to invoke the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur in plaintiff's action for injuries against the manufacturer of the shell.^{54.10}

The mere explosion of dynamite caps carries with it no presumption of negligence on the part of the manufacturer or seller, and the injured person has the burden of proving that the manufacturer or seller was guilty of the negligence charged,⁵⁵ particularly where such explosive is not under the exclusive control of defendant.⁵⁶ Similarly, in an action against the manufacturer of a powder fuse for injuries resulting to a purchaser from a delayed explosion, plaintiff has the burden of proving defendant's negligence.⁵⁷ However, in a minor plaintiff's action based on defendant's unlawful sale of a torpedo to him, he is not required to prove that the torpedo contained a dangerous and explosive substance, within the statute.⁵⁸ In an employee's action against the seller for injuries received from the delayed explosion of dynamite caps sold to his employer, whether the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable can be determined only as a matter of law after the evidence is heard.^{58.5}

Where the cause of an explosion may have been gas generated from lubricating oil or the presence of gasoline vapor, the mere fact of the explosion does not raise a presumption of negligence in the manufacture of the oil,⁵⁹ nor does the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur apply in an action for injury resulting from the ignition of gasoline purchased by plaintiff under circumstances which gave him an equal opportunity with defendant the refiner and seller, to observe the cause of the fire,⁶⁰ nor, in the absence of evidence showing that an explosion would not have occurred if the cleaning solvent sold by defendant had been of the represented flash point, is there a presumption of negligence on the part of defendant for selling a substance with a lower flash point.⁶¹ Moreover, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur has been held inapplicable, or proof of negligence required, in an action for injuries resulting from the explosion of oil sold as kerosene or fuel oil, brought against an oil refiner,⁶² a whole-

Agency of distributor

In an action against a refiner for the alleged negligence of its agent, a distributor, causing an explosion of oil sold to plaintiff as kerosene by

saler,⁶³ or a retailer.⁶⁴

Where injury results from the explosion of illegally sold gasoline, it has been held not necessary to prove that the illegal sale was the proximate cause of the injury.^{64.5}

d. Storage; Transportation

In actions for injuries from the storage or transportation of explosives, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur has been held applicable in some circumstances, but not in others.

According to some authorities, the mere explosion of explosives in store does not raise a presumption of negligence, or call for the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur,⁶⁵ particularly where such explosives are not, at the time of the explosion, within the exclusive control of the person sought to be charged with negligence.⁶⁶ According to other authorities, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies in actions involving the explosion of stored explosives,⁶⁷ particularly where they are under the exclusive control and management of defendant,⁶⁸ where they have been stored in dangerous quantities,⁶⁹ or where they escape.⁷⁰ Evidence by plaintiff that defendant did not use reasonable care in storing an explosive substance casts on defendant the burden of proving that he was not negligent.⁷¹

In an action for injuries sustained by children from stored explosives, there may be a presumption that such children lack sufficient understanding to form a criminal intent.⁷² The presumption which, under the attractive nuisance doctrine, favors trespassing children is, however, inapplicable, in an action for injuries resulting from the explosion of stored explosives, to a child of fifteen not shown to be of subnormal intelligence.⁷³

One attacking the validity of an ordinance requiring that storage containers for explosive substances be buried has the burden of overcoming the presumption in favor of the validity of such ordinance.⁷⁴

General rules governing the admissibility of evidence in civil actions have been applied in actions involving explosives. Evidence of defendant's caution and good faith is admissible only where the exercise of proper care constitutes a defense or exemplary damages are sought.

General rules governing the admissibility of evidence in civil actions have been applied to the admissibility of declarations by persons injured⁷⁶ or killed⁷⁷ by explosions, documentary evidence,⁷⁸ evidence as to other injuries,⁷⁹ other explosions⁸⁰ or other explosives,⁸¹ evidence as to the financial condition of the parties,⁸² opinion evidence,⁸³ evidence as to the quantum of damages,⁸⁴ and evidence as to customs and usages,⁸⁵ and as to other matters,^{85.5} as well as to the admissibility of positive and negative testimony.⁸⁶

Intent or good faith. Where the exercise of proper care constitutes a valid defense, full opportunity should be given defendant to show acts of caution and good faith on his part;⁸⁷ but where the exercise of care would not be a defense, and no claim is made for exemplary damages, evidence of such care is inadmissible.⁸⁸

Negligence in a blasting case may be proved by any relevant and material evidence. Evidence of damage to other property is to be received with extreme caution and only after a proper foundation is laid.

Kan. 514, 43 A.L.R. 854, error dismissed 46 S.Ct. 207, 270 U.S. 665, 70 L.Ed. 788.

Burden not sustained

Where tanks used for storage of kerosene and gasoline could be placed underground, and so doing would only be matter of expense and inconvenience to owner, burden of such owner has been held not met.

Negligence in a blasting case may be proved by any evidence that is relevant and material.^{88,50} In blast-damage cases, the fact that causation is often impossible of proof, except through circumstantial evidence, justifies a rather liberal attitude in judging the relevance of a particular circumstance.^{88,55} In actions for injuries resulting from blasting, particular evidence, or evidence as to various particular matters involved, has been held admissible, as being relevant, material, and competent,⁸⁹ while

Want of reasonable care

Evidence as to defendant's want of reasonable care in the use of explosives in blasting operations by which dirt and rock were cast on plaintiffs' premises is admissible to show negligence.

Ky.—States Corporation v. Shull, 287 S.W. 210, 216 Ky. 57.

Great force of blast

In suit for crack in wall of building, allegedly caused by nearby blasting operations, evidence indicating great force of the blast was relevant to issue of causation and to issue of whether crack existed before blast, and exclusion of such evidence was improper.

Tex.—Weaver v. Benson, 254 S.W.2d 95, 152 Tex. 50.

Contract

In action by owner of dwelling house to recover for damage allegedly caused by negligent blasting by defendant under a contract which required that every blast should be by use of delays and that blasting should be done with explosives of such power and in such quantities and positions as would not damage any existing structures, contract was admissible as evidence of negligence.

Conn.—Whitman Hotel Corp. v. Elliott & Watrous Engineering Co., 79 A.2d 591, 137 Conn. 562.

Quantity of explosive; manner of blasting

In an action for damages to property from blasting, evidence of the quantity of explosive used and manner of blasting is competent.

N.Y.—Cebrelli v. Church Constr. Co., 84 N.Y.S. 919.

25 C.J. p 208 note 73.

Conditions after blast; effect of blasting

(1) Testimony is admissible concerning the deposit of debris by a blast, and the condition of the damaged premises soon after.

Or.—Salmi v. Columbia & N. R. R. Co., 146 P. 819, 75 Or. 200, L.R.A. 1915D 834.

(2) Testimony of an architect and engineer as to the condition of plain-tiff's house several years after the blast alleged to have caused the injury has been held admissible over objection that it was too remote.

Mass.—Goldman v. Regan, 142 N.E. 701, 247 Mass. 492.

(3) In landowners' action for damage to buildings allegedly caused by blasting, the testimony of landowners, who occupied buildings throughout blasting operations, as to what they observed to be effect of blasting has been held admissible.

Pa.—Del Pizzo v. Middle West Const. Co., 22 A.2d 79, 146 Pa.Super. 345.

Failure to heed warning

Evidence that plaintiff failed to heed the warning given, or exposed himself to danger, such as proof that cries of fire were heard in his direction, is competent.

N.Y.—Sullivan v. Dunham, 41 N.Y.S. 1083, 10 App.Div. 438, 3 N.Y. Ann. Cas. 324.

Financial condition

Where defendants claimed that their son owned lot where explosion occurred, evidence of son's financial condition was admissible as showing what beneficial interest son had in property being improved; and financial standing of the independent contractor performing the building operations during which the blast occurred is admissible, where lot owners testified that they considered contractor's financial standing in awarding contract.

Wash.—Thompson-Cadillac Co. v. Matthews, 23 P.2d 399, 173 Wash. 353.

Notice to blaster

Testimony of plaintiff's husband disclosing notice to district claim agent of railroad of effect of previous blasting on his wife and requesting notice and warning of blasting in future is admissible as against contention that notice to district claim agent was not notice to railroad.

Mont.—Cashin v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 28 P.2d 862, 96 Mont. 92.

Opinion

(1) An expert witness may properly testify whether the blasting was heavier than was reasonably necessary for the purpose.

Ala.—Harbison-Walker Refractories Co. v. Scott, 64 So. 547, 185 Ala. 641.

(2) Testimony of an expert as to whether a blast covered as prescribed by ordinance could have thrown rocks a certain distance equal to that at which the injury was done is competent.

N.Y.—Koster v. Noonan, 8 Daly 231.

Ordinance

(1) Where the damage alleged was that loose fragments of rock were thrown against plaintiff's house by negligent blasting, a city ordinance requiring covering of the blast so as to prevent fragments of rock from being thrown into the air is admissible.

Iowa.—Mahoney v. Dankwart, 79 N. W. 134, 108 Iowa 321.

(2) Plaintiff's knowledge that blasting was done in disregard of ordinance, requiring the rock to be covered, may be shown in determining what would be due care on the part of plaintiff.

Mo.—Brannock v. Elmore, 21 S.W. 451, 114 Mo. 55.

Other blasts

(1) Evidence of negligent blasting by defendant, before and after the blast causing the injury, is admissible to determine the character of the blast in question.

Ga.—Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Bernstein, 38 S.E. 394, 113 Ga. 175.

(2) Where injuries were received from a piece of flying steel thrown out by a blast from a plant for breaking steel by explosives, evidence of previous emissions of pieces of steel from the plant was held admissible.

Pa.—Baker v. Hagey, 35 A. 705, 177 Pa. 128, 55 Am.S.R. 712.

(3) Where plaintiff was struck by a stone from a blast in a neighboring quarry, while he was on his own premises, evidence of stones being thrown on plaintiff's land in previous instances is admissible to show whence the stone came that struck plaintiff, and the distance it might be thrown.

Ohio.—Newburgh Brick & Clay Co. v. Chojnicki, 33 Ohio Cir.Ct. 356, affirmed 94 N.E. 1112, 83 Ohio St. 450.

(4) Evidence that rock suitable for quarrying, situated on plaintiff's land, was shattered by defendant's blasting on adjoining land is admissible on the question of damage.

Mass.—White v. Medford, 39 N.E. 997, 163 Mass. 164.

(5) In an action for damage to property caused by large quantities of high explosive, where defendant's testimony tended to show that other charges of explosives as great as or greater than, the charge from which plaintiff claimed injury had other evidence has been held inadmissible, or properly excluded.⁹⁰

Evidence of damage to other property in the vicinity is to be received with extreme caution and only where a proper foundation is laid.^{90.5}

With respect to the propriety of excluding particular evidence, the true question is the relevance of the excluded evidence to the finding which is claimed to render the excluded evidence unimportant.^{90.10}

Fireworks. In actions arising out of the explosion of fireworks, particular evidence has been held admissible as relevant, material, and competent,⁹¹ while other evidence has been held inadmissible.⁹² been fired without damage to property, testimony of defendant's superintendent that it was part of his duty at the quarry where the explosive was used to look around and have reports made whether injury had been done is admissible.

Ala.—Atlas Portland Cement Co. v. Sharpe, 96 So. 632, 209 Ala. 464.

Reputation

Evidence that contractor had reputation for being careless on jobs requiring use of high explosives has been held admissible.

Wash.—Thompson-Cadillac Co. v. Matthews, 23 P.2d 399, 173 Wash. 353.

Ages of plaintiff's children

Where the complaint alleges annoyance by blasting, and interference with plaintiff's enjoyment of his residence, evidence of the ages of his children is admissible to show the nature and extent of the violation of his right.

Ala.—Birmingham Realty Co. v. Thomason, 63 So. 65, 8 Ala.App. 535.

Miss.—Central Exploration Co. v. Gray, 70 So.2d 33, 219 Miss. 757.

Previous or subsequent acts

(1) Evidence of the effect of blasting rock near a house a long time previous to the blasts complained of is not admissible, where the former blasts were not shown to have been of equal force and kind.

Tex.—Mt. Franklin Lime & Stone Co. v. May, Civ.App., 150 S.W. 756.

(2) In action by corporation engaged in transportation of natural gas, for damages to pipeline allegedly caused by negligent explosion of a charge of dynamite by defendant's employees, following which explosion gas came from plaintiff's pipeline and caused fire, proof by defendant that there were three gas explosions on plaintiff's extensive pipeline over seven-year period was inadmissible as being so remote as to be wholly irrelevant and immaterial.

U.S.—Consolidated Elec. Cooperative v. Panhandle Eastern Pipeline Co., C.A.Mo., 189 F.2d 777.

(3) Evidence showing the manner in which defendant conducted blasting operations some weeks after the injury to plaintiff's building is inadmissible.

N.Y.—Luria v. Cusick, 93 N.Y.S. 507, 47 Misc. 126, 16 N.Y. Ann. Cas. 226.

Compensation payments

Evidence as to whether payments were made plaintiff for permanent disability and whether plaintiff took appeal when compensation payments ceased has been held inadmissible in action for personal injuries resulting from a blast.

Conn.—Loethscher v. Campo, 141 A. 652, 107 Conn. 568.

Conformity of building material to specifications

Evidence that brick used in a house damaged by blasting was different from that called for in building specifications is immaterial.

Tex.—Mt. Franklin Lime & Stone Co. v. May, Civ.App., 150 S.W. 756.

Value of use and occupancy

Evidence regarding difference in value of use and occupancy of house as dwelling before and during blasting, based on possibility that plaintiff could have taken in boarders, is incompetent and inadmissible.

Ky.—Jefferson County v. Pohlman, 49 S.W.2d 344, 243 Ky. 556.

Laughter of defendant's servants

In action for damages to property from blasting, evidence that defendant's laborers laughed regarding plaintiff's fright when blasts were discharged is incompetent.

Ky.—Vincennes Bridge Co. v. Poulos, 15 S.W.2d 271, 228 Ky. 446.

Duty of defendant to owner of house

In action by owner of dwelling house to recover for damage allegedly caused by negligent blasting by defendant under a contract which required that every blast should be exploded by use of delays to avoid damage to any existing structures, evidence of requirement of delays was not admissible to establish a duty owing by defendant to owner.

Mass.—Kushner v. Dravo Corp., 158 N.E.2d 858.

90.5 N.J.—Corpus Juris Secundum cited in Stanley Co. of America v. Hercules Powder Co., 108 A.2d 616, 625, 16 N.J. 295.

Evidence held admissible

(1) In an action for injury from negligent blasting, evidence is admissible showing the effect of the explosion on adjoining property and other buildings in the neighborhood, as bearing on the character and extent of the explosion.

Ala.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Lynne, 75 So. 14, 199 Ala. 631—Harbison-Walker Refractories Co. v. Scott, 64 So. 547, 185 Ala. 641. Conn.—Whitman Hotel Corp. v. Elliott & Watrous Engineering Co., 79 A.2d 591, 137 Conn. 562.

Tex.—Corpus Juris Secundum cited in Benson v. Weaver, Civ.App., 250 S.W.2d 770, 771, affirmed 254 S.W. 2d 95, 152 Tex. 50. 25 C.J. p 208 note 77.

(2) This is true as to other buildings or property in neighborhood more distant from place of blasting than plaintiff's.

Ala.—Ledbetter-Johnson Co. v. Hawkins, 103 So.2d 748, 267 Ala. 458.

Conn.—Whitman Hotel Corp. v. Elliott & Watrous Engineering Co., 79 A.2d 591, 137 Conn. 562.

Evidence held inadmissible

The exclusion of evidence that other property at various distances from that injured was not affected by the particular explosion is not error.

Ill.—Fitzsimons, etc., Co. v. Braun, 94 Ill.App. 533, affirmed 65 N.E. 249, 199 Ill. 390, 59 L.R.A. 421.

90.10 Tex.—Weaver v. Benson, 254 S.W.2d 95, 152 Tex. 50.

Finding pleaded as special defense

In suit for crack in building allegedly caused by dynamite explosion, mere fact that finding that crack existed in building prior to explosion, relied on to render exclusion of evidence offered to show unusual force of blast immaterial to correctness of judgment for defendant, was pleaded as special defense, was immaterial in determining whether evidence was properly excluded, since true question was relevance of excluded evidence to finding.

Tex.—Weaver v. Benson, supra.

91. Other fires and places

Evidence of other fires at other places in the community from the same cause may be admissible on behalf of plaintiff suing defendant for setting fire to house in setting off fireworks.

Ill.—Gerrard v. Porcheddu, 243 Ill. App. 562.

92. Absence of license

Where a voluntary spectator was injured while watching the discharge

c. Manufacture, Sale, or Use

In actions involving the manufacture, sale, or use of explosives, evidence, to be admissible, must be competent, relevant, and material.

of fireworks, evidence that defendants had no license to discharge the fireworks, and that their acts were unlawful, was held immaterial.

Mass.—Frost v. Josselyn, 62 N.E. 469, 180 Mass. 389.

Club membership; request for illumination

Evidence that plaintiff, who was injured by fireworks during a parade, was a member of the club which organized the procession and requested illumination along the line of march was held immaterial and incompetent.

Mass.—Fisk v. Wait, 104 Mass. 71.

Other fires and places

(1) Where one is injured by an explosion of fireworks alleged to have been wrongfully kept, it is not permissible to show that other fires caused by fireworks had occurred at other times on the premises of other persons, at least without proof that the fireworks and the conditions of ignition were similar.

N.Y.—Fillo v. Jones, 2 Abb.Dec. 121, 4 Keyes 328.

(2) In action for injuries to a child from explosion of fireworks found unexploded on defendant's premises after fireworks display, evidence regarding what defendant's superintendent knew about what took place as to explosions of powder at other fairs or fairgrounds after display of fireworks is inadmissible.

Minn.—St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 210 N.W. 80, 168 Minn. 353—Getz v. Standard Oil Co., 210 N.W. 78, 168 Minn. 347.

(2) In action, for injuries from the explosion of oil sold by defendant wholesaler as coal oil, testimony of defendant's superintendent, tending to show the quality of the mixture at the time it was sold and sent out for delivery to the retailer from whom it was purchased by plaintiff is admissible.

Kan.—Patterson v. Uncle Sam Oil Co., 191 P. 258, 107 Kan. 221.

Custom

(1) Evidence of custom of starting fires with kerosene is admissible in actions based on explosion of oil purchased as kerosene.

Ky.—Kentucky Independent Oil Co. v. Schnitzler, 271 S.W. 570, 208 Ky. 507, 39 A.L.R. 979.

(2) Where injuries resulted from the explosion of gasoline which leaked from an engine used to pump water, evidence that others than plaintiff had been allowed to use the pump, and had to start the engine, and prime the pump, is admissible on the question of invitation and custom.

Iowa.—Snipps v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., 146 N.W. 468, 164 Iowa 530.

(3) Where city, as tenant of a privately owned garage, engaged refining company to relocate a pipe connecting a gasoline pump with gasoline storage tank, evidence of custom imposing duty on refining company to air-test entire installation before delivery of gasoline was relevant in an action for injury to one, and death to another, city employee in an explosion of gasoline fumes.

Pa.—Doyle v. Atlantic Refining Co., 53 A.2d 68, 357 Pa. 92.

(4) In action against manufacturer and seller of dynamite, caps, and allegedly defective fuse for injuries to buyer as result of premature explosion, evidence of seller's inability to qualify for license to own, possess, and control explosives, manufacturer's knowledge of such fact, and defendants' continuance of use of seller's unqualified personnel in distributing explosives would be relevant to show manufacturer's knowledge of personnel's incompetence and malice or intent, in support of plaintiff's allegations of manufacturer's willful and wanton misconduct in turning over distribution of explosives to unqualified personnel in violation of trade custom, if seller's negligence proximately resulting in injuries is proved.

In actions to recover for injuries resulting from the manufacture, sale, or use of explosives, evidence which is relevant, material, and competent is admissible,⁹³ while on the other hand evidence not of that

(1) In an action for damages resulting from adulterated kerosene sold by defendant, it is proper to allow an expert witness to describe the process of producing kerosene from petroleum, in order to show that gasoline is the lighter product, and to prove what the substance sold was; and it is also proper to show by an expert that gasoline or a mixture containing gasoline would throw off a vapor and ignite at a lower temperature than pure kerosene.

Mich.—Stowell v. Standard Oil Co., 102 N.W. 227, 139 Mich. 18.

(2) In action against bottler of soda water for injury to buyer when bottle exploded, evidence by persons familiar with bottling business that defective bottle would break in bottling machine, and explosion thereafter would be caused by improper amount of pressure from carbonic gas in bottle, is admissible.

R.I.—Douglas v. First Nat. Stores, 172 A. 723, 54 R.I. 278.

Letters of complaint; notice

In plumber's action against manufacturer of chemical mixture for cleaning drains for injuries sustained in explosion, evidence of manufacturer's president concerning letters of complaint received by other users of product was admissible on question of notice to manufacturer of danger in using solvent.

U.S.—Kieffer v. Blue Seal Chemical Co., C.A.N.J., 196 F.2d 614.

Time of purchase

In action against seller of celluloid water-waving combs for injuries incurred when they exploded while buyer was drying her hair with electric lamp, where complaint alleged that combs were bought of defendant on certain date, evidence that combs or part thereof were bought of defendant in prior years was admissible.

N.Y.—Treacy v. F. W. Woolworth Co., 1 N.Y.S.2d 919, 253 App.Div. 899.

Acts of purchaser at time of purchase

In action for delivering gasoline instead of kerosene, resulting in fire, evidence concerning acts of purchaser at time of purchase is admissible on issue whether he called for coal oil and as affecting his credibility.

Failure to warn buyer

Testimony of storekeeper ordering kerosene that oil company's employees failed to warn him of danger of using matches near by is admissible in an action for damage resulting to such storekeeper when the oil which was delivered exploded. Ark.—Gibson Oil Co. v. Bush, 1 S.W. 2d 88, 175 Ark. 944.

Advertisement

In an action for injuries from the explosion of stove polish sold by defendant, his advertisement of such polish was held admissible, where the answer put in issue all material allegations of the complaint. Mass.—Gately v. Taylor, 97 N.E. 619, 211 Mass. 60, 39 L.R.A., N.S., 472.

Conversations between buyer and seller's agent

In action for injuries resulting from explosion of refrigerating coil and tank unit which had been sold as junk by defendant, proof of conversation had by buyer with seller's service manager respecting the dismantling of old refrigerating units was held admissible. N.Y.—Delisa v. Arthur F. Schmidt, Inc., 34 N.E.2d 336, 285 N.Y. 314.

Representations by defendant's salesman made in employee's presence in connection with sale of cleaning fluid are admissible in such employee's action for personal injury caused by explosion.

U.S.—Louisiana Oil Refining Corporation v. Reed, C.C.A.La., 38 F.2d 159, certiorari denied 50 S.Ct. 355, 281 U.S. 751, 74 L.Ed. 1162.

Certificate of an oil inspector containing statutory data and delivered to defendant, a wholesale dealer in kerosene, after kerosene had been tested while in tank car, was, in suit by customer for injuries due to explosion, admissible as against objection that inspector's record was the best evidence.

Iowa.—Way v. S. L. Collins Oil Co., 173 N.W. 20, 187 Iowa 1375.

Booklet issued by defendant, who installed a gasoline light plant in deceased's house, by explosion of gasoline from which he was killed, was admissible as tending to the belief that precaution was unnecessary.

Ill.—Mahlstedt v. Ideal Lighting Co., 110 N.E. 795, 271 Ill. 154, Ann.Cas. 1917D 209.

Other persons, places, or things

(1) Testimony that the witness had used kerosene for many years in a certain manner is admissible as tending to indicate that the person injured from an explosion of kerosene in starting a fire was not guilty of gross negligence.

Ga.—Standard Oil Co. v. Reagan, 84 S.E. 69, 15 Ga.App. 571.

(2) In view of proof tending to show that the ingredients of a disinfectant manufactured and sold by defendant to plaintiff were such that unless careful steps were taken to exclude pent-up gas it was likely to accumulate and cause explosions, evidence of neighbors as to explosion of same disinfectant bought by them about same time as that which exploded, injuring plaintiff, is admissible.

U.S.—W. T. Rawleigh Co. v. Shoulitz, C.C.A.Pa., 56 F.2d 148.

(3) In an action for injuries from gasoline, alleged to have been improperly labeled, or delivered as kerosene, it may be shown that, on the morning after the accident, children of the family of the person injured were seen in possession of a gasoline can properly labeled.

Iowa.—Dubois v. Luthmers, 126 N.W. 147, 147 Iowa 315.

Previous or subsequent acts

Ky.—Ray's Adm'r v. Standard Oil Co., 61 S.W.2d 1067, 250 Ky. 111.

(2) Evidence that defendant threw away a large quantity of the same kind of oil as that which exploded may be admissible on the question of negligence.

La.—Reed v. Nelson, 63 So. 484, 133 La. 968.

94. U.S.—E. I. Dupont de Nemours Powder Co. v. DuBoise, Ala., 236 F. 690, 150 C.C.A. 22. 25 C.J. p 207 note 58.

Immaterial provisions of contract

In an action for death resulting from the alleged negligence of defendant oil company, with respect to oil sold by it, where the contract of sale includes provisions, immaterial to any issue in the case, as to oil containers, the entire contract is not admissible.

Ky.—Ray's Adm'r v. Standard Oil Co., 61 S.W.2d 1067, 250 Ky. 111.

Events before and after accident

(1) In an action for injuries from the explosion of stove polish sold by defendant, evidence that the stove polish was generally sold in the market before and after the accident was inadmissible.

Mass.—Gately v. Taylor, 97 N.E. 619, 211 Mass. 60, 39 L.R.A., N.S., 472.

(2) Where the injury was caused by ignition and explosion of a certain oil stain, by a match lit while applying it, evidence that such stain had not ignited before in manufacture or use is immaterial.

Mass.—Thornhill v. Carpenter-Morton Co., 108 N.E. 474, 220 Mass. 593.

(3) Evidence as to temporary mental affliction of defendant seller's employee some time after the accident which resulted in the injuries for which suit is brought, is inadmissible.

Ky.—Ray's Adm'r v. Standard Oil Co., 61 S.W.2d 1067, 250 Ky. 111.

Other sales or substances; sample

(1) Negligence in the sale of coal oil containing gasoline cannot be proved by proof of negligence on another occasion in a sale of gasoline containing coal oil.

Kan.—Patterson v. Uncle Sam Oil Co., 191 P. 258, 107 Kan. 221.

(2) In an action for injury resulting from explosion of stove polish without proper warning, the warning contained on other polishes, which are not shown to be similar, is immaterial.

Conn.—Wolcho v. Rosenbluth, 71 A. 566, 81 Conn. 358, 21 L.R.A., N.S., 571.

(3) In action to recover for injuries received on explosion of oil purchased as kerosene, evidence that analysis of sample of kerosene drawn from container in store where kerosene was purchased showed that the liquid analyzed was dangerous for use in lamps or for starting fires is inadmissible, in absence of proof that liquid sold was same or had same contents as sample which was analyzed.

Va.—Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey v. Cox, 181 S.E. 375, 165 Va. 128.

(4) In action against oil company and its retailer for injury to consumer from explosion of illuminating oil purchased from retailer whom the company supplied, where there was evidence that retailer also kept for sale oil purchased from another oil company, testimony as to the quality of the oil purchased from defendant retailer by persons other than plaintiff at the time he purchased, without showing that the oil so testified to was supplied by defendant oil company, is inadmissible.

Ind.—Standard Oil Co. of Indiana v. Robb, 149 N.E. 567, 85 Ind.App. 21.

Employee's orders

Evidence that an employee of defendant company had been ordered to keep all but employees away from the place where gasoline or other explosives were used is inadmissible, where such order was not shown to have been known to plaintiff.

tion, but not on another.^{94.5}

d. Storage and Keeping; Transportation

In actions for injuries resulting from the storage, keeping, or transportation of explosives, evidence, to be admissible, must be competent, relevant, and material.

Custom as showing agency

In an action against a torpedo company and one furnished by it to shoot charges of nitroglycerine in an oil well for damages for a premature explosion, evidence of a custom among torpedo companies to shoot wells only at the risk of the owner was held immaterial on the issue of the relation of agency between the codefendants.

Tex.—Southwestern Oil Development Co. v. Illinois Torpedo Co., Civ. App., 252 S.W. 334, error dismissed Illinois Torpedo Co. v. Southwestern Oil Development Co., 278 S.W. 1115, 114 Tex. 582.

Temperature

In an action for injury from explosion of oil sold by defendants, testimony as to temperature of room wherein such explosion and injury occurred is inadmissible without proof that temperature was taken near date of accident.

U.S.—Louisiana Oil Refining Corporation v. Reed, C.C.A.La., 26 F.2d 14, certiorari denied Reed v. Louisiana Oil Refining Corporation, 49 S.Ct. 31, 278 U.S. 632, 73 L.Ed. 549.

Test of fuse

Evidence as to whether mining company made test of fuse it bought from defendant manufacturer was held immaterial on question of manufacturer's liability for injuries to miner when dynamite was prematurely discharged due to defective fuse.

Conn.—Jump v. Ensign-Bickford Co., 167 A. 90, 117 Conn. 110.

Malice or misconduct proximate cause

In action for injuries caused by premature dynamite explosion, evidence supporting allegations that defendant corporations, which manufactured and sold to plaintiff dynamite, caps, and allegedly defective fuse, knew from previous experience that their negligence in violating customs of industry by turning over sale to untrained and incompetent personnel would probably result in injuries to plaintiff because it had resulted in similar injuries to others, but, in utter indifference to consequences, continued blindly in such course of conduct, was admissible on question of defendants' malice or wanton misconduct, but not on question whether sale of articles to plaintiff was negligence proximately causing injuries.

Ga.—Flint Explosive Co. v. Edwards, supra.

95. Neb.—Clay v. Butane Gas Corp., 39 N.W.2d 813, 151 Neb. 876.

Contract to carry explosives may be admissible, notwithstanding contractor had not received municipal license to transport explosives.

U.S.—Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. State of Russia, C.C.A.N.Y., 21 F.2d 406, certiorari denied 48 S.Ct. 159, 275 U.S. 571, 72 L.Ed. 432.

Custom or usage

(1) Evidence as to general custom and usage in regard to keeping explosives may be admitted.

Tex.—Barnes v. Zettlemoyer, Civ. App., 62 S.W. 111.
25 C.J. p 206 note 41.

(2) Evidence of custom or usage of cutting off the motors of motor vehicles while filling their gasoline tanks is admissible on issue of negligence in filling gasoline tank while motor was running.

Ala.—Walker v. Stephens, 127 So. 668, 221 Ala. 18.

(3) Evidence of custom of cleaning gasoline tanks before sending them for repairs, and employer's assumption that tanks sent him were so cleaned, is admissible in action for injuries to employee by explosion.

Mode of construction of magazine

(1) In an action based on theory that storage was a nuisance, evidence as to defective construction of the magazine was inadmissible.

Cal.—Fernandez v. Western Fuse & Explosives Co., 167 P. 900, 34 C.A. 420.

(2) In an action against one for the alleged negligent construction and maintenance of a magazine, it has been held that evidence of the manner of construction of other magazines is admissible.

Ark.—Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Burrows, 96 S.W. 336, 77 Ark. 74.
S.C.—Emory v. Hazard Powder Co., 22 S.C. 476, 53 Am.R. 730.

Nature, power, and quantity of explosives

(1) The nature, character, and rel-

General rules of evidence govern the admissibility of evidence in actions involving the storage and keeping, or the transportation, of explosives, evidence which is relevant, material, and competent being proper and admissible,⁹⁵ but not evidence which ative power of explosives stored or kept may be shown.

Utah.—Smith v. Mine & Smelter Supply Co., 88 P. 683, 32 Utah 21.

(2) So, in action for injuries from explosion of flare, manufactured by defendant, allegation of complaint that it was highly and dangerously explosive made determination of its explosiveness a material element, and evidence of its composition relevant and admissible.

Cal.—Willson v. Superior Court of California, in and for Los Angeles County, 225 P. 881, 66 C.A. 275.

(3) In an action for injuries by the explosion of a powder magazine, evidence is admissible concerning the quantity of explosives kept.

U.S.—Kerbaugh v. Caldwell, Pa., 151 F. 194, 80 C.C.A. 470, 10 Ann.Cas. 453.

25 C.J. p 207 note 46.

Opinion

(1) An expert on methods of removing explosive dust from mills and thus preventing explosions may testify concerning the various systems, and their practicable application to the mill where the explosion occurred.

U.S.—Quaker Oats v. Grice, Vt., 195 F. 441, 115 C.C.A. 343.

(2) Evidence by one who installed an oil plant that certain apparatus was safer than other apparatus which he had tested and found impracticable was admissible.

Ark.—Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Burrows, 96 S.W. 336, 77 Ark. 74.

Previous or subsequent conduct or situation

(1) In an action for damages to property caused by the explosion of dust in a mill, caused by gradual overheating, evidence was held admissible that grain in the bins was very hot fifteen days before the explosion.

U.S.—Quaker Oats v. Grice, Vt., 195 F. 441, 115 C.C.A. 343.

(2) In an action against an oil company to recover for damages suffered by reason of an explosion of gasoline at defendant's warehouse, evidence as to prevention of such an accident as the one in question on previous occasions by defendant's exercise of ordinary care has been held admissible for the purpose of determining, in connection with the other facts and circumstances, whether defendant was careful at the time in question.

N.C.—Fox v. Texas Co., 105 S.E. 437, 180 N.C. 543.

(3) In an action for injuries sustained by plaintiff through explosion of nitroglycerin transported in an automobile by defendant, evidence that after the accident defendant removed a load of nitroglycerin from another car similarly equipped and placed it in a car properly equipped is competent and admissible to show the defective equipment of the car in which the explosion occurred.

Kan.—Ladlie v. American Glycerin Co., 223 P. 272, 115 Kan. 507.

(4) In action for injury to a child from explosion of dynamite cap found in school basement, evidence showing that basement was cleaned next day is admissible to show that defendant was in possession of the basement at time cap was found.

Ky.—Jones Savage Lumber Co. v. Thompson, 25 S.W.2d 373, 233 Ky. 198.

Knowledge of gases or danger therefrom

Evidence of plaintiff, a country merchant, suing for personal injuries sustained in explosion of gasoline, that he had no knowledge of presence of, or danger from, gases arising through uncapped pipe leading from defendant's abandoned gasoline tank is properly admitted.

Md.—American Oil Co. v. Wells, 165 A. 298, 164 Md. 422.

Rules of carriers

In an action against carriers for death by explosion of dynamite in their yard, their rules were admissible to show negligence.

Ky.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Adkins' Adm'r, 117 S.W. 321, 133 Ky. 219, modified on other grounds and motion for rehearing and oral argument denied 119 S.W. 820, 133 Ky. 219.

Other evidence held admissible

(1) Testimony that gasoline is very inflammable and must be handled carefully is admissible in action for injuries by explosion of gasoline fumes.

R.I.—McArthur v. Dutee W. Flint Oil Co., 146 A. 484, 50 R.I. 226.

(2) Where injuries result from the explosion of a powder magazine, alleged to constitute a nuisance, evidence of the density of population and proximity of dwellings and highways in the vicinity is admissible.

Mass.—Flynn v. Butler, 75 N.E. 730, 189 Mass. 377.

Mo.—Liggett v. Excelsior Powder Mfg. Co., 202 S.W. 372, 274 Mo. 115.

(3) In suit for injuries from fire and resulting explosion of defendant's kerosene tank, testimony that there was no fire-fighting department in city was held to be admissible as circumstance tending to show whether defendant negligently maintained and operated petroleum products storage station.

Ark.—Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Berry, 65 S.W.2d 533, 188 Ark. 431.

(4) Where a filling station had been leased by plaintiff owner to defendant refiner and operated by a third party under an authorized dealer agency agreement with defendant, in an action for negligent destruction by fire of garage and filling station as a result of an explosion of gasoline while being delivered from defendant's truck to tank of filling station, evidence held competent and admissible included lease agreement between plaintiff and defendant, authorized dealer agency agreement between defendant lessee and the third party in possession, and courtesy card given by defendant to plaintiff to purchase gasoline, for which collection was made by defendant's distributor.

S.C.—Tate v. Claussen-Lawrence Const. Co., 167 S.E. 826, 168 S.C. 481.

96. Conditions subsequent to accident

(1) In action for injury to a child from explosion of dynamite cap found in school basement, evidence concerning condition of basement on next day is inadmissible, in the absence of a showing that condition was same.

Ky.—Jones Savage Lumber Co. v. Thompson, 25 S.W.2d 373, 233 Ky. 198.

(2) In an action against an oil company to recover for damage caused by an explosion of gasoline at defendant's warehouse, the finding of a piece of wire near the warehouse after the explosion, offered to prove that defendant's plant was dynamited, was held inadmissible as too remote and conjectural, especially in the presence of strong evidence that the gasoline was exploded from internal causes of defendant's own making.

N.C.—Fox v. Texas Co., 105 S.E. 437, 180 N.C. 543.

Custom or usage

(1) In an action for damages by fire alleged to have been caused at a gasoline filling station by a static spark due to defendant's negligence in not providing a safety chain or device, evidence as to the system in use at another filling station, or by another company owning such station, was properly excluded as relating to the custom or practice of a single company, and not tending to show any general custom or practice in the use or nonuse of safety devices at filling stations.

U.S.—Standard Oil Co. of New York v. R. L. Pitcher Co., C.C.A.Me., 289 F. 678.

(2) Certain customs or usages relating to the storage or keeping of explosives have been held inadmissible.

U.S.—Standard Oil Co. v. Parrish, Ill., 145 F. 829, 76 C.C.A. 405. 25 C.J. p 206 note 41.

Carrier's and manufacturer's rules

(1) One whose dwelling near a railroad yard was injured by explosion of a car of dynamite in the yard may not introduce in evidence rules of the railroad company governing the conduct of its employees in handling cars of dynamite, or rules of the company which manufactured the dynamite.

Ky.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Stewart, 132 S.W. 435, 141 Ky. 270.

(2) Street railway company's rule against carriage of explosive articles on its cars is inadmissible to show intervening negligence, absolving motion picture distributor from liability for injuries to passenger by explosion of film on car, where the carrier was not aware of the presence of such explosive.

Mass.—Guinan v. Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, 167 N.E. 235, 267 Mass. 501.

Ordinance

(1) Where an action is founded on the wrongful storage of dynamite or other explosives, so as to constitute a nuisance, an ordinance not relating to the storage of explosives is inadmissible, although it relates to explosives, or to building restrictions.

Pa.—Forster v. Rogers, 93 A. 26, 247 Pa. 54.

(2) Where the proximate cause of the injury was the leaving of dynamite exposed after blasting, rather than the explosion of fireworks, an ordinance forbidding the explosion of fireworks was properly excluded.

Mo.—Moore v. Jefferson City Light, etc., Co., 146 S.W. 825, 163 Mo.App. 266.

(3) In action for death by explosion of dynamite in freight car due to a fire in the freight yards, city ordinance relative to the storage and carriage of dynamite was held properly excluded, as not applicable to the facts.

Colo.—Willson v. Colorado & S. Ry. Co., 142 P. 174, 57 Colo. 303.

Other accidents, persons, or places

(1) In an action for damages alleged to have been caused at a gasoline filling station by a static spark, due to defendant's negligence in not providing a safety device, testimony as to other fires was properly excluded, where the circumstances of such other fires were not shown to be admissible,^{96.5} but not where the shipment involved is wholly intra-state in character.^{96.10}

On the issue as to whether the improper storage of explosives was the proximate cause of a child's injuries, proof may properly be adduced as to whether, within the actual or constructive knowledge of defendant, children played at location of the storage, and if so, in what numbers and how frequently.^{96.15}

Cal.—Phoenix Assur. Co., Limited, of London, v. Texas Holding Co., 252 P. 1082, 81 C.A. 61.

(3) Evidence of other acts in which defendant was negligent in leaving dynamite caps in places accessible to children is inadmissible in an action to recover for injuries resulting to child plaintiff from caps which he found belonging to defendant.

Miss.—Hercules Powder Co. v. Wolf, 110 So. 842, 145 Miss. 388.

(4) In actions for injuries resulting to the owner of well when he dropped lighted match into it igniting combustible gases causing explosion, evidence concerning the condition of a well on adjoining premises is inadmissible.

Ky.—Maise v. Imperial Oil Co., 137 S.W.2d 1104, 282 Ky. 124.

(5) In an action based on the negligent construction and maintenance of a magazine, it has been held that evidence of the manner of construction of other magazines is inadmissible.

N.Y.—Bradley v. People, 56 Barb. 72.

(6) Other cases have held evidence as to the construction of other magazines admissible.

Ark.—Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Burrows, 96 S.W. 336, 77 Ark. 74.

S.C.—Emory v. Hazard Powder Co., 22 S.C. 476, 53 Am.R. 730.

Warnings

In an action for wrongful death from an explosion of stored gasoline during a fire, testimony of warnings of danger is properly excluded where it is not shown that deceased was in a position to hear them.

Mo.—Buchholz v. Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, 244 S.W. 973, 211 Mo.App. 397.

Other evidence held inadmissible

(1) Truck driver's testimony as to his employer's instructions relative to driving truck was improperly admitted in action for death from injuries by explosion of gasoline while filling truck, being res inter alios acta as to plaintiff's cause of action. Ala.—Stephens v. Walker, 117 So. 22, 217 Ala. 466.

(2) In action against oil company for death of acetylene welder who was induced to leave his work on tanks which he was reconditioning under contract with oil company, to repair certain other tanks of the company, and who was killed in explosion which occurred when he applied torch to leak in one of such other tanks, evidence as to whether a welder on premises of defendant was given free rein, and whether witness suspected anything dangerous around tank, was held inadmissible. U.S.—Crow v. Continental Oil Co., C. C.A.Tex., 115 F.2d 740.

(3) Board of fire prevention regulations as to licensing of buildings or structures used for storage of inflammable fluids and permits for maintenance and use of tanks of over ten thousand gallons capacity were erroneously admitted in evidence over defendant's objection, although it conceded that it had no license or permit for tank cars from which oil was pumped to diesel engines, as such cars were not buildings or structures within purview of license requirements and only evidence of their capacity was a photograph showing label "8,111 gallons" on one of cars.

§ 11(9). — Questions of Law and Fact

- a. Questions of law
- b. Questions of fact

a. Questions of Law

In actions involving explosives, questions of law are to be determined by the court, and where the evidence is clear and undisputed, the matter is for the court.

In actions involving explosives, questions of law are to be determined by the court;¹⁴ and the legal sufficiency of the evidence to afford an inference of defendant's negligence is a question for the court to determine before submission of such issue to the jury.^{14.5}

Where the evidence is clear and undisputed, the matter is for the court, and should not be submitted to the jury.¹⁵ Thus, in particular cases a directed verdict for defendant may be held proper or required,^{15.5} as may a nonsuit,^{15.10} an affirmative instruction,^{15.15} or an instructed verdict;^{15.20} or defendant may be held entitled to a peremptory instruction.^{15.25}

On the other hand, a directed verdict, nonsuit, or dismissal may be held not proper,^{15.30} and the overruling of a demurrer to plaintiff's evidence may be held proper or not erroneous.^{15.35}

b. Questions of Fact

- (a) In general
- (b) Particular questions

(a) In General

Controverted questions of fact are to be determined by the jury, if there is evidence warranting submission of the issue to them.

Where the record presents any evidence which would cause fair-minded men to differ as to whether there was a reasonably probable relation of cause and effect, that issue is required to be submitted to the jury for determination.^{15.50} Thus, controverted questions of fact are to be determined by the jury,¹⁶ if there is evidence warranting submission of the

Where there was no allegation or issue made as to particular matter, trial court improperly charged jury should not be confusing or misleading,⁴⁴ or prejudicial to a party,^{44,5} and must not enlarge the legal duty of defendant.⁴⁵

Where the instructions given wholly cover the rules of law and questions of fact involved, additional instructions need not be given.⁴⁶ When a case is submitted for a special verdict, it is error to inform the jury under what circumstances plaintiff can or cannot recover;⁴⁷ and where the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply, it is error to instruct that it is incumbent on defendant to explain the circumstances of the explosion.⁴⁸ Where several causes of the explosion are alleged, the court may instruct to find for defendant if from all the evidence the jury find that the cause of the explosion lies wholly within the realm of conjecture and doubt;⁴⁹ and an instruction making a verdict for plaintiff dependent on actual injury or damage from the explosion is proper.⁵⁰ Where negligence is clearly shown, the court may give an instruction which in effect limits the jury's consideration to the sufficiency of the warning and contributory negligence.⁵¹

Blasting. In accordance with the rules discussed supra § 8, in a case where absolute liability is imposed for damages caused by blasting, it is proper to instruct that defendant is liable even though he was not negligent,⁵² even for injuries caused by concussion or vibration;⁵³ but, where absolute liability is not imposed, the instruction must make recovery dependent on negligence.⁵⁴

Particular instructions relating to blasting have been held proper,⁵⁵ such as instructions relating to defendant's negligence,⁵⁶ and instructions requiring him to exercise extraordinary diligence and care, and to give proper warning,⁵⁷ submitting to the

in such manner as to indicate that such was an issue in case.

Instructions relating to the conduct or knowledge of the person injured,⁶¹ such as an instruction that plaintiff may recover if he had no notice of the blast in question, and did not know of the custom of giving notice of the blasts,⁶² have also been held proper, as has an instruction that defendant is responsible only for damages proximately and naturally resulting from the use of high explosives.⁶³

§ 11(11). — — — Verdict, Findings, Judgment, and Review

General rules governing verdicts, findings, judgments, and review in civil actions apply in actions relating to explosives.

The verdict in an action relating to explosives should be responsive to the evidence or instructions,⁷⁷ and should be consistent.⁷⁸ A particular verdict for defendant has been held not to disclose that the jury had been confused and influenced by passion and prejudice or had fallen into plain mistake.^{78.5}

Findings in civil suits based on negligence with respect to explosives should be construed and given effect according to their intentment.^{78.10} The findings should not be contradictory and inconsistent with each other,^{78.15} and where a special finding is inconsistent with the general verdict, the special finding ordinarily controls.^{78.20}

The judgment in such an action must conform to, and be supported by, the verdict or findings.⁷⁹

§ 11(12). — — — Damages

In actions relating to explosives, recovery may be had for all elements of damage which are the natural and proximate consequences of the wrong. The measure of damage for injury to property is an amount which would fairly compensate for the injury, such as the resulting difference in value or the cost of repair.

In actions relating to explosives, damages, to be recoverable, must be the natural and proximate consequences of the wrong suffered by plaintiff.⁸¹ Where some part of the damages caused by blasting is the result of vibration or concussion and not the result of trespass, there can be no recovery for such damage in the absence of a finding of negligence.^{81.5} Claims are limited to personal injury or physical property damage, and the claims of one who has suffered an economic loss based on contract will not be recognized.^{81.10}

A recovery may be had for physical pain and suffering,⁸² physical injury,⁸³ loss of earnings or services,⁸⁴ deterioration in the value of property,⁸⁵ loss of rents and profits,⁸⁶ or interruption of business.⁸⁷

Mental suffering from fright and anxiety may properly be considered in assessing damages, in connection with physical injury;⁸⁸ but it has been held that damages cannot be awarded for fright independent of any physical injury,⁸⁹ and no damages can be recovered for imaginary suffering or fanciful anxiety of mind.⁹⁰

The penal sum of a bond to pay damages caused by the use of explosives need not be apportioned among persons suing thereon before judgment.⁹¹

A question as to damages may be properly submitted to the jury, even though not pleaded, when evidence with respect thereto is introduced without objection on such ground.^{91.5}

The measure of damage for injury to property caused by an explosion is an amount which would fairly compensate for the injury,⁹² such as the difference between the value of the injured property before the explosion and its value thereafter,⁹³ or the cost of repairing and restoring it to its former condition,⁹⁴ provided the cost of restoration is less than the depreciation in value.⁹⁵

Exemplary damages may be recovered only where the elements authorizing their award under general rules are present.⁹⁶ Thus, plaintiff is not entitled to

a. In General

Reasonable and enforceable statutes or ordinances making it an offense to use, keep, sell, or transport explosives otherwise than in conformity with prescribed regulations are ordinarily upheld.

The validity of statutes or municipal ordinances which make it unlawful to use, keep, sell, or transport explosives otherwise than in conformity with prescribed regulations has ordinarily been sustained,⁹⁷ provided they are not uncertain,⁹⁸ unreasonable,⁹⁹ or unenforceable,¹ and even though the necessarily general form of the law may embrace some innocent objects.²

Fireworks. The possession, sale, or use of fireworks, other than under specified statutory requirements, may constitute an offense.^{2.5}

b. Construction and Operation of Statutes

Statutes making punishable acts or omissions as to explosives are construed strictly and in favor of accused, but they must also be construed reasonably and with a view to the object sought to be accomplished.

In determining the construction of a statute making punishable acts or omissions with reference to explosives, the object sought to be accomplished by the statute must be considered.³ Such statutes, be-

Particular terms defined or construed

(1) Meaning of word "explosives," in statute prohibiting possession of certain explosives for unlawful purposes, is determined by statutory, rather than lexicographers', definition.

Ohio.—Wechsler v. State, 179 N.E. 356, 124 Ohio St. 401.

(2) Word "within," in statute denouncing crime of exploding dynamite within building, means in the inner or interior part of the building, and does not mean near, about, or adjacent to.

Ky.—Commonwealth v. Becknell, 84 S.W.2d 24, 260 Ky. 207.

(3) A water tank used to supply a town and mining operations therein is a "building" within a statute penalizing the explosion of explosives in, under, or near any building, etc., or other place where human beings usually frequent, inhabit, assemble, or pass, and such statute does not require that an explosion or attempted explosion at or near buildings shall be at a place where human beings usually frequent, inhabit, assemble, or pass.

N.M.—State v. Ornelas, 74 P.2d 723, 42 N.M. 17.

(4) Where the word "explosives" is not defined in the statute, it must be presumed to have been used by the legislature in its ordinary sense, that is, according to common understanding.

Pa.—Commonwealth v. Bristow, 138 A.2d 156, 185 Pa.Super. 448.

(5) Statute defining "fireworks" was held not so vague, indefinite, uncertain, or ambiguous as to render it void and unenforceable, and was not unconstitutional.

Colo.—People v. Young, 339 P.2d 672.

Actual damage unnecessary

(1) Statute making it unlawful to use dynamite to injure property held not to require that actual damage be done to constitute offense.

Hawaii.—Territory v. Palai, 23 Hawaii 133.

(2) One causing explosion, with intent to do damage to property or injury to person, is guilty of complete offense under statute, regardless of whether damage or injury results.

Pa.—Commonwealth v. Kocher, 60 A. 2d 385, 162 Pa.Super. 605.

Possession

Under statutes permitting prosecution, as principals, of all persons concerned in commission of offense, automobile occupant who had knowledge that dynamite was in automobile could be convicted for statutory offense of malicious and reckless possession of dynamite, regardless of whether any portion of dynamite was actually on person of occupant, or on persons of any other people in automobile.

Cal.—People v. Buyle, 68 P.2d 268, 20 C.A.2d 650.

Buyer's intention

(1) Under a statute punishing the sale of explosives with intent that they be used for injury to, and destruction of, life and property, a sale of bombs, with reasonable grounds to believe buyer intended unlawful use, completes offense, although buyer's intention be lawful.

Ill.—People v. Ficke, 175 N.E. 543, 343 Ill. 367.

(2) However, where the statute punishes the selling or giving of explosives to another, knowing that such explosives are intended to be used for the injury or destruction of property or of persons, a fictitious intent on the part of the person to whom the explosives are given will not sustain a conviction.

Wis.—Koscak v. State, 152 N.W. 181, 160 Wis. 255.

ing penal, are construed strictly⁴ and in favor of accused;⁵ but they must also be construed reasonably and not with undue technicality so as to defeat their purpose.⁶ The criminal section of a statute relating to explosives controls, in cases falling within such section, over general provisions in other sections of the statute,⁷ and a statutory provision defining certain offenses with reference to explosives is not repealed by a subsequent statute regulating the manufacture and sale of explosives.⁸

Under a statute punishing the procuring of explosives with intent to use them for the unlawful injury to, or destruction of, life or property, going to a place where stolen explosives have been concealed in order to get them for an unlawful use constitutes a procuring of them within the meaning of the statute,⁹ and the possession of explosives is proof of the procurement thereof, although not of the requisite intent.¹⁰ A statute punishing persons who shall "keep for sale" particular substances regarded as explosive is applicable, without regard to the question of ownership, to one who as agent for another keeps and sells such property.¹¹

Elements of offense. The elements constituting the crime of violating a statute dealing with the malicious use of explosives are the intent to injure, terrify, or intimidate a human being and the placing or depositing, or attempting to deposit, an explosive in a place normally used by human beings.^{11.5}

A criminal intent is a necessary element of the offense of using, exploding, or having in possession any fireworks in violation of a statute.^{11.10}

Placing explosives. Where the statute punishes the preparation of combustible matter or explosive substances and putting them in any place with the intent to set fire or blow up or destroy any house, etc., there must be both a preparation and a placing in order to constitute an offense,¹² but it is not necessary that the explosive or combustible shall have been set afire.¹³ The explosive must have been placed in the place to be destroyed or at least in a place near by.¹⁴

Bombing statute. The particular evil sought to be curbed by the enactment of a bombing statute is violence to persons or property through the use of bombs or other explosives in, on, or near certain vehicles and designated places.^{14.5} In order to justify a conviction under such a statute for bombing a vehicle, it is not necessary to show that the bomb was hurled, thrown, or dropped into the vehicle;^{14.10} and so long as the letter and spirit of the statute are violated, it is immaterial that the statute, at the time of its original enactment, was intended to cover treason and sabotage or violence in connection with strikes.^{14.15}

Whether person was placed in danger of bodily injury as result of defendant's act would not be determined, in prosecution for bombing, from results alone, but would also embrace manner, method and means employed by defendant.

Careless use of explosives

The sections of act relating to explosives covering careless use of explosives and penalty to be imposed in case of death caused by violation of act were special provisions to be regarded as exceptions to general provision relating to penalty, and therefore offense of careless use of explosives was a misdemeanor as stated in that particular section.

Bomb defined

(1) Noun "bomb" was intended to designate an infernal machine employing explosives contrived by criminals to accomplish bodily injury or destruction of property.

Miss.—Rogers v. State, supra.

(2) Under statute making bombing a criminal offense, term "bomb" is not restricted to its military significance, but is used in broader sense to include a device or object containing an explosive connected with a fuse.

Mo.—State v. Londe, 132 S.W.2d 501, 345 Mo. 185.

14.10 Miss.—Rogers v. State, 89 So. 2d 860, 228 Miss. 373.

Acts held within statute

Placing dynamite in bus, while it was empty and parked near residence of bus driver, so that the dynamite would explode when ignition was turned on by bus driver when he boarded the bus to begin his morning run, was clearly within bombing statutes.

Miss.—Rogers v. State, supra.

Requirement that vehicle be occupied

Where bus driver was in bus when dynamite exploded, presence of bus driver in bus when bomb exploded was sufficient to satisfy requirements of bombing statute that bus be occupied.

Miss.—Rogers v. State, supra.

14.15 Miss.—Rogers v. State, supra.

Sale of oil or gasoline below test or standard. In the absence of any express statutory provision as to the instrument to be used in determining the temperature at which oil is inflammable, and of any facts showing that it was intended that any particular instrument or method should be used in ascertaining the point of inflammability, those reasonably accessible instruments and methods by which that point can be most accurately ascertained should be used for the purpose.¹⁵ Under a statute punishing the keeping for sale of illuminating oils inflammable at less than a specified temperature, the oil is "inflammable" at the "fire" point as distinguishable from the "flash" point.¹⁶ A wholesale dealer may be liable where he sells oil below the requisite standard, and with knowledge that it is purchased to be retailed for the ordinary purposes of heating and illuminating, to one who retails it in the course of his business.¹⁷ Although the statute makes it unlawful to sell or offer for sale illuminating oils, including naphtha, below a standard fixed by law, it is not unlawful to generate gas from naphtha from a stationary gas machine.¹⁸

Transportation. The acts of congress making it unlawful to transport explosives upon any vessel or vehicle operated by a common carrier in interstate commerce and carrying passengers are applicable to passengers or persons traveling upon the trains as well as to the carrier,¹⁹ and have been said, by way of dictum, to apply to intra-state, as well as interstate, shipments.²⁰ The person who sends the explosive violates the statute, as does the person who receives it.²¹ The prohibition against transporting nitroglycerine upon vehicles engaged in interstate passenger traffic extends also to dynamite made by mixing nitroglycerine with some solid and inert absorbent substance;²² and a statute regulating the shipment of gun cotton is applicable to nitro cellulose, either wet or dry.²³

Where the character of goods is discovered before their actual shipment, which is thereby prevented, the person offering the goods for shipment is not liable for a penalty imposed for shipping them.²⁴

The failure of those transporting explosives or highly inflammable material to stop before a railroad crossing may be made a statutory offense;^{24,5} and it has been stated that the power of the legislature to enact such a statute cannot be doubted.^{24,10} The purpose of such a statute is to prevent collisions between trains and vehicles transporting dangerous materials.^{24,15}

The violation of regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission promulgated under a statute dealing with the transportation of explosives is also an offense.^{24,20}

Defenses. The fact that a wholesale dealer had no personal knowledge of the quality of the oil sold by him is not a defense.²⁵ In a prosecution for the carrying of explosives upon a train carrying passengers, it is no defense that accused was an officer in the army of a foreign country engaged in war and that the explosive was so carried for the purpose of being used in an alleged act of war in the enemy territory.²⁶

c. Indictment, Information, or Complaint

An indictment or information charging violation of a statute punishing acts involving explosives must set forth all the facts necessary to bring accused within the applicable statutory provisions; but the statutory form need not be followed.

An indictment or information charging a violation of a statute or regulation punishing acts with reference to explosives must set forth all the constituent facts and circumstances necessary to bring accused within the applicable statutory provisions;²⁷ and where the indictment is otherwise sufficient, words which are merely surplusage may be eliminated, and such elimination does not affect the validity of the indictment.^{27.5} Thus, a charge of carrying nitroglycerine does not show a violation of a statute prohibiting the carrying of a cartridge containing dynamite,²⁸ nor does a charge of carrying and depositing dynamite caps show a violation of a statute as to shells or bombs containing dynamite.²⁹

An indictment charging a manufacturer of explosives with a failure to obey an order issued by an officer of the state as to the conditions in and about the factory must charge that the order was issued by an officer vested with authority under the law.³⁰ An indictment charging possession and control of cartridges and bombs sufficiently charges the offense of unlawful possession or use of explosives;³¹ but an indictment charging possession of a bomb without naming the type, kind, or nature of the bomb is insufficient.^{31.5} However, an indictment which charges accused with unlawfully possessing and having in his control a bomb, which is described as a collection of nitroglycerine, capable by its ignition and explosion of causing damage to persons and property, is sufficient to describe a bomb within a statute making possession or control of a bomb un-

A statute making it a crime to make, procure, etc., explosives, with intent to injure or unlawfully destroy life or property, is for the protection of property generally, and an indictment charging such crime need not name the person injured or the owner of the property to be destroyed.³² Under a statute making it unlawful to manufacture or procure explosives with the intent to use them for the unlawful destruction of life or property, and providing that any person abetting or in any way assisting in making, manufacturing, buying, procuring, etc., such explosives knowing or having reason to believe that they are intended to be used by any person or persons in any way for the unlawful injury to or destruction of life or property, shall be deemed a principal, one guilty as accessory before the fact is to be indicted and punished as a principal.³³

An indictment has been held not defective for not following the statutory form,³⁴ or for not alleging the date of the crime, so as to show its commission after the amendment of the statute defining the offense;³⁵ but, a complaint charging a violation of an ordinance prohibiting the sale of fireworks within a specified distance of the corporate limits of a city may be fatally defective under a statute requiring that in a prosecution for such unlawful sale, the state's pleading must name the purchaser.^{35.5}

There is no variance between an indictment charging an intent to use explosives for unlawful injury to, or unlawful destruction of, life or property and evidence to prove that the property of a particular corporation was destroyed, since such evidence did not establish that only the property of that corporation was destroyed or that the purpose of defendants was to destroy only that property.³⁶

d. Evidence

General principles governing the presumption of innocence, burden of proof, and admissibility and weight and sufficiency of evidence in criminal prosecutions apply in prosecutions for offenses as to explosives.

36. Ill.—People v. Robertson, 120 N. E. 539, 284 Ill. 620.

A person accused of violation of a statute, ordinance, or regulation punishing acts involving explosives is favored by the usual presumption of innocence, and the burden of proving all the essential elements of the offense rests on the prosecution.³⁷ However, where the prosecution has made a prima facie case, as by proving facts which give rise to a presumption in its favor,³⁸ it is incumbent on accused to produce evidence in denial or explanation of the incriminating circumstances.³⁹

Admissibility. The issue of intent is said to allow a wider range of evidence in support thereof than is allowed in the support of other issues;⁴⁰ so, on a trial for the unlawful manufacture of an explosive, the nature of the substance itself, the concealment of it, the fact that it is unnecessary in accused's lawful business, and contemporaneous declarations may all be considered in determining accused's unlawful intent.⁴¹ Other evidence that has been held admissible is set out in the note.⁴²

Testimony as to the ordinary mode of constructing powder magazines has been held incompetent.^{42.5}

Weight and sufficiency. The evidence in such prosecutions must be sufficient to prove every essential of the offense charged.⁴³

e. Trial

Disputed questions of fact are for the jury under proper instruction by the court.

In criminal prosecutions involving explosives, disputed questions of fact are for the jury⁴⁴ under proper instructions by the court.⁴⁵

Verdict. Where the indictment charges two offenses and the evidence is sufficient to establish one and not the other, a general verdict of guilty cannot be sustained.⁴⁶

EXPORT. The noun "export" or "exports" and its correlative "import" or "imports" as technical legal terms used in the tariff acts are defined and discussed in Customs Duties §§ 2-4.

The verb, etymologically, signifies "to carry out,"¹ and in its primary, general, or essential meaning, to § 13. Forfeitures and Penalties

A forfeiture of explosives unlawfully kept, with a penalty for their keeping, may be imposed by statute.

Some statutes have imposed a forfeiture of explosives unlawfully kept, together with a penalty for their keeping.⁴⁷ Under a city ordinance prohibiting the sale of fireworks and fixing a fine in a stated amount as the only punishment assessable thereunder, a punishment of a fine of less than the stated amount is not authorized.^{47.5} trade or disposition, rather than for one's own use or convenience.⁴

The term is directly contrary in meaning to "import,"⁵ and has been distinguished from "transport."⁶

Exported. In its ordinary sense, carried out of the port.⁷ A term applied to merchandise when it is unloaded at a foreign port.⁸

EXPORTATION. See Customs Duties § 3 notes 16-20.

EXPORTERS. A term applied to cattle which are supposed to weigh about one thousand four hundred pounds and which are intended for export rather than for the retail trade.^{8.50}

The term has been distinguished from "market-ers."^{8.55}

EXPOSE. To bring into view, display, or exhibit; to point out or show to the bystanders;⁹ to submit or subject to any action or influence;^{9.5} to lay open;¹⁰ to deprive of concealment;^{10.5} to place in a situation to be affected or acted on;¹¹ to disclose or unmask something criminal, shameful, or the

With reference to a child or children, to abandon, to turn or cast out, to place or leave in a probably fatal position;¹³ to cast out to chance, to place abroad, or in a situation unprotected, or to remove from shelter.¹⁴

It has been said that it would be very difficult to find any single word in the English language that is used in a wider sense, and is more flexible, than the word "expose,"^{14.5} and this word, and more particularly the past tense or past participle, "exposed," may have different meanings according to the circumstances of the different cases in which it is used; in each case one must look to the surrounding circumstances in order to ascertain what the word means.¹⁵

"Expose" has been distinguished from "deposit" see the C.J.S. definition Deposit.

Phrases employing the word are set out in the subjoined note.¹⁶

4. Must be as an article of trade

In construing a statute making a slave free if he were unlawfully exported from the state it was held that "the true meaning of the term 'export' in this connection, is the taking or carrying out as an article of trade or merchandise. It is a mercantile term. If a man carry his slave as a body servant, for his own use, and bring him back, it is not exporting."

19. A maxim meaning "A contemporaneous exposition is the most powerful in law."
Conn.—Sage v. Wilcox, 6 Conn. 81, 89
—Williams v. Brace, 5 Conn. 190, 195.

Basis of maxim

"The maxim rests on this unquestionable truth, that the persons living at the time when a law is enacted, are better able to ascertain the mischief at which it was aimed, and consequently, the legislative intent, than those persons are, who come into existence at a period remotely subsequent. Hence, if the language in ancient charters has become obscure from antiquity, or the construction is doubtful, the constant and immemorial usage under the instrument, may be resorted to, for the purpose of explanation; and in the case of an act of parliament, universal usage is a proper expositor, where the language is, in any respect, ambiguous."

EXPRESSIO UNIUS PERSONÆ EST EXCLUSIO ALTERIUS.⁵⁸EXPRESSIO UNIUS PERSONÆ, VEL REI, EST EXCLUSIO ALTERIUS.⁵⁹*EXPRESSIO VEL DESIGNATIO PERSONÆ EST EXCLUSIO ALTERIUS.⁶⁰

EXPRESSLY. The adverb has been said to have a definite meaning in law, being the same as that of the adjective "express;"⁶¹ and it has been defined as meaning in a clear or distinct,⁶² a direct or pointed,⁶³ or an express⁶⁴ manner; definitely, explicitly, in direct or unmistakable terms;⁶⁵ directly,⁶⁶ distinctly,⁶⁷ in direct terms,⁶⁸ not by implication;⁶⁹ particularly,⁷⁰ plainly,⁷¹ pointedly;⁷² with distinct purpose.⁷³

While, in its primary meaning, the term denotes precision of statement, as opposed to ambiguity, implication, or inference, and is equivalent to "in an express manner," or "in direct terms," it is also commonly used to designate purpose, and as equivalent to "especially," or "particularly," or "for a distinct purpose or object."⁷⁴

EXTEND.

In General

The term is derived from "ex," from or out of, and "tendere," to stretch or stretch out,⁹⁴ and, when employed transitively, requiring an object, it is used in the sense of to stretch out or to draw out or to enlarge a thing, and implies something in existence,⁹⁵ and something to be extended.⁹⁶

It is, both by etymology and by common usage, exceedingly flexible, lending itself to a great variety of meanings, which must in each case be gathered from the context owing to the fact that it is essentially a relative term, referring to something already begun,⁹⁷ and implying its continuation;⁹⁸ hence, in a concrete sense, it has no persistent meaning, although abstractly it always implies increase or amplification as distinguished from inception, as, for instance, to extend a man's business, or his line of credit, or the due time of his debts.⁹⁹

It is not confined to mere linear prolongation,¹ although in its primary sense, when applied to a line, the word may import a continuation of the line without a break, but it is not always used in this restricted sense.²

When applied to streets, "extend" may mean more than linear prolongation and may involve the acquisition of necessary lands for such public use.³

Present Tense

In its primary sense, the word has been defined as meaning to stretch or draw out,⁴ to stretch or reach,⁵ to stretch or to stretch out,⁶ to stretch out

92.50 Meaning of the term

Ex-servicemen are those who have performed military service, and the term may be applicable to those who served on active duty only part-time and without compensation, but this designation may also be confined to a more definite and narrow class of individuals who performed military service, to those whose full time and efforts were at the disposal of military authorities and whose compensation included military pay and allowances. Such ex-servicemen are those who completely disassociated themselves from their civilian status and their civilian employment during the period of their military service, suffering in many cases financial hardship and separation from home and family. They formed the great bulk of the regular armed forces during World War II. In the popular mind, they were typified by the full-fledged soldier, sailor, marine, or coast guardsman.

Extended

It has been said that the most common usage of the word "extended," especially in legal connotation, is along the line of its derivation, to stretch out.^{39.5} The term is defined as meaning stretched; spread or drawn out;⁴⁰ prolonged.⁴¹

The word is peculiarly applicable when the question of time is being considered,⁴² and, in a particular connection, implies action within the time originally fixed,⁴³ and a lengthening out of the time previously fixed and not the arbitrary setting of a new date.⁴⁴

At other times and in other connections, it has no relation to time of payment, but to the inclusion of other or additional property in an instrument.⁴⁵

The term has been held equivalent to "given;"⁴⁶ and has been compared with, or distinguished from, "enlarged" see the C.J.S. definition Enlarge, and "renewed."⁴⁷

(5) "Extended lease," construed in a particular connection, as meaning that certain leases issued under an earlier statute, which did not conform to the intention of the legislature, must be "extended" to meet the new statutory requirements, that is enlarged, "stretched," upon all the terms and conditions of the instrument.

Mont.—Rathbone v. State Board of Land Commissioners of Montana, 47 P.2d 47, 49, 100 Mont. 109.

Extending

It has been said that where the context deals with land, not with mathematical lines, the natural meaning is "reaching" or "stretching," as distinguished from "produced" or "protracted;"⁴⁹ and where the term is used in connection with construction of streets it refers to lengthening, not widening, the street,⁵⁰ and not to the construction of a tunnel thereunder.⁵¹

Phrases employing the word are set out in the subjoined note.⁵²

EXTENDER. In Spanish law, to commit to writing at length; as equivalent to the English "extended;"⁵³ also to give greater extent, when used of rights, jurisdiction, authority, etc.; to apply to new cases, when used of laws.⁵⁴

In English practice, the name of a writ of execution,—derived from its two emphatic words,—more commonly called an "extent."⁵⁶

EXTENSION. The word is not a word of art, and, having no legal or technical significance, may mean whatever the parties intended when contracting.⁵⁷

It is defined generally as meaning the act of extending or state of being extended;⁵⁸ a stretching out;^{58.5} enlargement in dimension, area, duration, or scope;^{58.10} a stretching or expanding, a reaching or stretching out as in space, time, or scope;^{58.15} prolongation or enlargement;^{58.20} an enlargement in breadth, or continuation of length;^{58.25} increase;^{58.30} augmentation;^{58.35} expansion;^{58.40} en-

"Extension" is further defined as meaning an enlargement of the main body; the addition of something smaller, or of less import, than that to which it is attached;⁶⁰ that property of a body by which it occupies a portion of space;⁶¹ and, more specifically, as an addition to existing facilities,⁶² the continuance of an existing thing;⁶³ involving the idea of something preëxisting with which it is connected and which is thereby enlarged;⁶⁴ a part constituting an addition or enlargement,⁶⁵ and the prolongation of a previous estate.⁶⁶

In a particular connection, the term has been held to denote an intention to extend the benefits of a contract to others than those originally named therein.⁶⁷

In commercial law, an indulgence by giving time to pay a debt, or perform an obligation;⁶⁸ the allowance on the part of the creditor to a debtor of further time to pay a debt, the granting of further time in which to do something which has been set down for a particular day, a postponement by agreement of the parties of the time set for acting;⁶⁹ an agreement made between a debtor and his creditors, by which the latter, in order to enable the former, embarrassed in his circumstances, to retrieve his standing, agrees to wait for a definite length of time after their several claims should become due and payable, before they will demand payment.⁷⁰

In one or another of the senses above indicated, the term has been held equivalent to, or synonymous with, "construction" see the C.J.S. definition of that term, and "renewal;"⁷¹ and has been compared with, or distinguished from, "improvement"⁷² and "renewal."⁷³

Extension of credit. The term ordinarily means a giving or an allowance of credit;⁷⁴ an indulgence by giving time to pay a debt, the allowance on the part of the creditor to a debtor of further time to pay a debt;⁷⁵ and when applied to a credit already obtained it may mean, according to the context, either an increase in the amount of the credit or an extension of the time for payment of the debt.⁷⁶

Extension of credit as affecting liability of surety see Principal and Surety § 127; and forbearance of suit as not constituting extension of credit so as to release indemnitor see Indemnity § 40.

Other phrases are listed in the subjoined note.⁷⁷

EXTENSIVE. Primarily, extended widely in space, time, or scope; great, or wide; and secondarily, capable of being extended.⁷⁸

The term has been held to be an equivalent of "general,"⁷⁹ but not synonymous with "extraordinary."⁸⁰

EXTENSORES. See the C.J.S. definition Ex.

EXTENT. The word in common use varies somewhat in meaning, according to the subject to which it is applied, and as that changes it may as well refer to time as to space, or proportion, and more especially so when applied to interests, as in patents, for a particular term of years.⁸¹

The word "extent" is defined as meaning space or degree to which a thing is stretched or extended; hence bulk, compass, length, as an extent of line, and size, as a great extent of country or of body;⁸² nature and amount;⁸³ nature or character;⁸⁴ also communication or distribution.⁸⁵

In American practice, as an "extendi facias," or writ of execution see Executions §§ 12, 403 and Extendi Facias ante.

In English practice, a writ of execution issuing from the exchequer upon a debt due the crown, or upon a debt due a private person, if upon recognizance or statute merchant or staple, by which the sheriff is directed to appraise the debtor's lands, and, instead of selling them, to set them off to the creditor for a term during which the rental will satisfy the judgment.⁸⁶ It is sometimes referred to as the crown's writ of extent, a summary writ in the nature of an execution.⁸⁷

In Scotch practice, the value or valuation of lands; the rents, profits, and issues of lands.⁸⁸

"Extent" has been compared with, or distinguished from, "duration" see the C.J.S. definition of that word, and "manner."⁸⁹

surfaces,⁹⁶ and is not limited so as to include only the front portion of the building.^{96.5}

As an adjective, it has been defined as external, on the outside, pertaining to the outside part, as the exterior part of a sphere.⁹⁷

Both as a noun and as an adjective, it has been contrasted with, or distinguished from, "inside"⁹⁸ and "interior."⁹⁹

Phrases employing the word are set out in the subjoined note.¹

EXTERNAL. It has been said that the word can apply only to something which has an outside and an inside;² and it has been defined as meaning acting from without, really being without, or relating to the outside, as the external surface of the body;³ exterior or outward;⁴ outwardly perceptible, visible; physical or corporeal, as distinguished from mental or moral;⁵ visible from the outside; hence, apparent, or capable of being perceived.⁶

As applied to a house, it means everything external to the house, or, as it is popularly called, "out of doors."⁷

When used in connection with a personal injury, it has been said that it is not always necessary that the word shall be interpreted as related to a blow or fall, but that it is given a wider sweep as an element of causation where bodily injuries follow, as in the case of an accident resulting from a drug taken exercising a force external to its natural effects.⁸

The term is used in contradistinction to "internal."⁹

External damage refers to the condition of a particular part of a thing which has an inside and an outside, and, specifically, to the outer or exterior part thereof.^{9.5} There is a distinction between "external damage" and external cause."^{9.10}

35. In its application to debts

(1) An extinguishment takes place only when the original debt is destroyed, as if a feme sole marries her debtor, or if a debtor is made executor at common law, etc. So taking a security of a higher nature extinguishes the first security, but a security of an inferior or equal degree does not extinguish the first security.

§ 1. Definitions and Nature of Offense in General

"Extortion" means the taking or obtaining of anything from another by means of illegal compulsion or oppressive exaction. At common law, and under statutes declaratory thereof, "extortion" is a crime committed by an officer who, under cover of office, unlawfully takes any money or thing of value not due him, or more than is due, or before it is due; but under other statutes it includes any obtaining of property from another through a wrongful use of force or fear.

The ordinary meaning of the word "extortion" is the taking or obtaining of anything from another

by means of illegal compulsion or oppressive exaction.¹

As common-law offense. Extortion is a well known common-law crime;^{1,5} in the common law the term "extortion" has acquired a technical meaning, and designates a crime committed by an officer of the law who, under cover or color of his office, unlawfully and corruptly takes any money or thing of value that is not due to him, or more than is due, or before it is due.² In a more enlarged sense, it signifies any oppression under color or pretense of right.³

As statutory offense. In many jurisdictions, under statutes penalizing extortion and containing no contradictory provisions, the common-law definition of extortion is applicable,⁴ and the statute must be considered with reference to the common law.^{4.5} Under other statutes, the definition includes any obtaining of property from another through a wrongful use of force or fear, thus including acts not done under color of official right.⁵ It has also been held that extortion consists in demanding an illegal fee or gift to influence official conduct.⁶ Where one does not occupy any official position but obtains money through a false representation that he is the agent of an officer, he is guilty of obtaining money under false pretenses and not of extortion under a statute punishing extortion by any person "under color of his official right."⁷

A statute punishing persons holding offices in the several departments of the government who, in addition to their salaries, appropriate and receive compensation beyond their salaries has no application to the crime of extorting money under color of office;⁸ and a statute providing for the punishment of a government employee who uses his position of employment with the government to extort does not purport to punish a federal employee for soliciting and receiving money which he appropriates to his own use or to punish a federal employee who is guilty of fraud.^{8.5} The term "extortion," as used in an act to safeguard the public against fraud, extortion, and similar abuses in the resale of theatre tickets by brokers, means the exaction of money made possible because of oppressive conditions or circumstances, as distinguished from the receipt of money as a result of free negotiations and willingly paid for a service or commodity.⁹

Extortion by force or fear otherwise than under color of official or other right is considered in Threats and Unlawful Communications § 10.

Character and grade of offense. Extortion is an abuse of public justice,¹⁰ and a misuse by oppression of the power with which the law clothes a public officer.^{10.5} It has been said to be an offense of a particularly odious character,¹¹ and abhorrent to all who believe in decent government, and the broad statutory proscription thereof is rightly applied to public officers whatever be the nature of their duties.^{11.5}

It was regarded as a misdemeanor at common law,¹² and is, under statutory definitions, also ordinarily an offense of that grade,¹³ it being a form of malfeasance in office,^{13.5} although under some statutes it is a felony.¹⁴

"Blackmail" defined and compared. In common parlance and general acceptance, the term "blackmail" is equivalent to, or synonymous with, extortion,¹⁵ and is defined as the exaction of money for the performance of a duty, the prevention of an injury, or the exercise of influence;¹⁶ the wrongful exaction of money;¹⁷ the extortion of money from a person by threats of accusation or exposure;¹⁸ the extortion of money from a person by threats of accusation, or exposure, or opposition in the public prints;¹⁹ an extortion of hush money;²⁰ obtaining value from a person as a condition of refraining from making an accusation against him, or disclosing some secret calculated to operate to his prejudice;²¹ a bribe to keep silence;²² hush money.²³

The statutory crime of blackmail is considered in Threats and Unlawful Communications.

Bribery is distinguished from extortion in Bribery § 1 b.

Fraudulent conversion. There is no connection between extortion and fraudulent conversion.^{23.5}

"Oppression" defined and compared. The word "oppression" is a word of more extensive signification than "extortion" and will embrace many other acts of official malfeasance and misfeasance,²⁴ and in its ordinary sense indicates an act of cruelty, severity, unlawful exaction, domination, or excessive use of authority.²⁵ The statutory crime of oppression has been described as an unlawful use of authority, and it is not committed by threats, but by an unlawful act of the accused.²⁶

Robbery and extortion by force or fear are distinguished in Robbery § 1.

Theft does not include extortion,^{26.5} and they are not the same offense.^{26.10}

§ 2. Elements of Offense

In general, for the taking of fees to constitute the crime of extortion it is sufficient, if the other requisite elements are present, that the fees taken were not allowed by law, or were greater than those allowed by law, or were exacted before they were due, or were for services not performed.

At common law, a taking, to constitute extortion need not have been as a fee or compensation for some official duty for which a fee is prescribed;²⁷

Blackmail as scheme to defraud by threats

Threats as not essential

The meaning of blackmailing is not legally confined to extortion by threats or other morally compulsory measures; the influence arising out of previous dependency and superfluous gratitude to a public officer for merely doing his duty arising out of the recovery of property expected to be lost, accompanied by the power of playing on the hopes and fears of the party injured, may be as effective as any moral compulsion.

but under some statutes this is an essential element of the offense.²⁸

Fees not allowed by law. An officer who demands fees not allowed by law is, at common law and under statutes embodying the common-law rule, guilty of extortion.²⁹ If the money is accepted for the performance of official duties, the offense is committed regardless of whether the transaction is disguised as a tip or gratuity,^{29.5} or whether the money is paid before or after performance.^{29.10} A salaried officer who has the power to do certain things which another officer may do, and who, in addition to his salary, demands the fees to which such officer would have been entitled, may be guilty of extortion.³⁰ Under a statutory definition restricting extortion to the willful demand and reception by any officer of higher fees than are allowed by law, it has been held that the willful demand and reception of fees not allowed by law are not extortion.³¹

Fees greater than allowed by law. It is extortion at common law for an officer to take more than the prescribed amount for particular services for which fees fixed in amount are given by law.³² Where a statute defines extortion as the corrupt exaction of greater fees for official services than are allowed by law, the exaction must be for real or pretended official services demanded of one who at least believes himself to be under legal obligation to pay something.³³ The presentation of an account for fees to the body authorized to allow it is sufficient to amount to a demand within the meaning of a statute punishing an officer who shall "wilfully demand or receive higher fees than are allowed by law."³⁴

Fees exacted before due. It is extortion at the common law, and, in some states, by express provision of statute, for a public officer to receive, by power of office, a fee before it is due, although no more is taken than will in all probability soon become due.³⁵ It is equally criminal for a public officer to refuse to perform a public duty until paid.³⁶ Statutes which relate to this offense and which contain no provision prohibiting the collection of a lawful fee before it is due, have been construed not to alter the common law in this particular.³⁷

Fees held unauthorized

(1) A violation of statute prohibiting an officer from accepting unauthorized compensation for the performance or nonperformance of a duty may occur by the officer demanding or receiving unlawful compensation or by the officer accepting unlawful compensation voluntarily offered him in consideration for which he agrees to perform or execute or not to perform or execute any law, rule, or regulation that it is incumbent on him to respect, execute, or to have executed.

Condition precedent

A statute prohibiting an officer from accepting unauthorized compensation for the performance or nonperformance of duty applies in cases where reward, compensation, or other remuneration is made a condition precedent to the performance or nonperformance of a legal duty.

It has been held, however, that receiving fees before they are due, at the instance, and for the accommodation of the person paying them, is not extortion.³⁸ With respect to the question as to when a fee becomes due, the general rule, in the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, is that the officer may demand his fee upon the rendition of his official service.³⁹

Fees for services not performed. At common law, and under statutes fixing fees for stated services, an officer who takes fees for official services which he has not performed is guilty of extortion.⁴⁰ However, an officer cannot be guilty of demanding and receiving money as a fee for a service or act not done, unless the service or act which he did not do, and for which he accepted a fee, is within his official duty.⁴¹

Oppression. A public officer is guilty of oppression where he unlawfully arrests another, or detains him against his will, or seizes or levies on another's property, or dispossesses another of any lands or tenements, or does any other act whereby another person is injured in his person, property, or rights.⁴²

Demand of loan. Under some statutes, extortion may be in the form of a demand of a loan.⁴³

Conspiracy. In order that the crime of extortion be committed, all of the necessary elements must be present; and a conspiracy or confederation to commit the crime does not satisfy these requirements where steps are taken only to promote the conspiracy.⁴⁴

Federal employee. Under a statute providing for the punishment of an employee who uses his position of employment with the United States to extort, the two essential elements are that the employee uses his position with the United States and that he be guilty of extortion.^{44.5}

§ 3. — Intent

Generally, to constitute extortion, the act must have been done with corrupt intent, that is, with design to collect fees to which the officer is not entitled. Mistake or ignorance of law has been held not to free the officer from criminal intent, except where the law is unsettled; but mistake of fact, inadvertence, or miscalculation is a valid defense.

The common meaning of the word "willful" is intentional, and the common meaning of the word "fraudulent" is dishonest, and presumably such words are inserted in a statute defining the offense of extortion by a public officer to relieve from criminality one who mistakenly believes that he is entitled to a fee.^{44.50} At common law and under statutes declaratory thereof, in order to constitute extortion, the act must have been done with a corrupt intent,⁴⁵ although under statutes so providing the unlawful taking by an officer, under color of his office, of money not due to him is criminal without a specific intent.⁴⁶ The fact that the officer was subsequently willing to pay over the money claimed to have been extorted to whomever was the proper authority does not affect his liability.⁴⁷

The corrupt intent lies in the design on the part of the officer to collect fees to which he is not legally entitled.⁴⁸ Thus, the fact that the money
